Bits For Breakfast

missive as children.' . . . (Indians thronged at the two portages of the Columbia to obtain supplies of salmon and to barter. They were generally described as a 'greedy, treacherous, thieving and bloodthirsty lot.' They were the middlemen between the natives of the coast and those of the interior.)

"Captain Meriweather Lewis in 1886 called the cascades Indians 'the greatest thieves and scoundrels we have met with.' On the journey down in 1805 and on the return in 1806, only the vigilance of Lewis and Clark prevented an Indian attack. The explorer well knew that the Indians were plotting treachery. A party of Astorians was attacked at Celilo falls in 1812, on the way to New York with dispatches for John Jacob Astor, and was robbed of baggage and horses. John Reed, who carried a bright tin box containing the letters, was badly wounded. Another party of six Astorians, in making their way down in 1812, among whom were Ramsay Crooks and John Day, were robbed, and the four others perished. The two survivors arrived at Astoria 'in a pitiable condition, the savages having stripped them of everything, leaving them but some bits of deerskin to cover their nakedness.'

"A party of 18 Northwesters, under Alexander Stuart and James Keith, met the same hostility above Celilo falls in 1814, and were turned back toward Astoria. . . . Stuart was wounded and a large amount of trading goods was seized . . . A short time before, the Indians attacked another party of Northwesters, between the cascades and Dalles . . . A punitive expedition, from Astoria, of 62 men, intimidated the Indians, but inflicted no effective punishment. Later in 1814 an expedition, from Astoria, of 90 men, made the two portages safely, because of the strong armed force. Ross Cox narrates a series of difficult episodes at the cascades in 1812, in which a thieving Indian was shot. He relates a similar experience above Celilo falls in 1818, in which the Indians were overawed by superior strategy and compelled to restore stolen goods; also an encounter in 1814, in which a French Canadian was killed.

"An Indian agitator in 1817, according to Cox, attempted to excite the natives with this soap box speech: 'How long are the whites to pass here, troubling our waters and scaring away our fish, without paying us? Look at all those bales of goods going to our enemies, and look at our wives and children naked!' On this occasion Ross says the natives were mustered 'to the number of about 1000 warriors.'

"But after 1830-31, travelers up and down the Columbia river had no trouble with the aboriginal thieves and murderers. Fur traders no longer needed forces of men, strongly armed. Settlers, who were then beginning to arrive, and who in 1840 and thereafter were to go to the Willamette in growing numbers, were to be but little molested.

"The race conflict at the narrows of the Columbia river was ended; not, however, by the white man's strategy of prowess, but by the white man's diseases. . . .

"The Indians of the interior, more resistant to the white man's ills, were to drive out the whites with the Whitman massacre of 1847 and the Yakima war of 1855-6, until the hunt for gold in 1860 should bring in the palefaces in greater numbers, with firewater and renewed diseases to complete the ruin of the savages.

"It may be of passing interest to mention here the Indian remedies described by Gibbs. For a tonic and venereal medicine he says the aborigines used a decoction of the Oregon grape; for an emetic, an extract of the camas root, or of the cucumber vine, the latter being employed as a cathartic; for gonorrhea, a tea steeped with a species of fern and the smoke of certain plants and woods; for abortion and stimulant in childbirth, a powder made of the tail of a rattlesnake; for a poultice, the inside bark of the skunk weed; for a fomentation for bruises and sprains, the juice of the colt's foot; for broken limbs, splints of wood and bandages. The women wrapped their bodies in twigs of hemlock or spruce at periodic times. Swellings the Indians often scarified, and bad sores they frequently cauterized. Ross Cox describes the cold plunge and the steam bath as remedies for rheumatism, and says than an old Indian of the Flathead tribe cured him of rheumatism of the shoulders and knees with a 25 day treatment of the cold plunge in midwinter, which included vigorous rubbing in icy water."

Bomb Threat No Poser to Bank Teller

LOS ANGELES, April 21 — (AP)—A man bearing a package thrust a note at Teller Charles M. Campbell in a branch of the Citizens National Trust and Savings bank Wednesday.

The note read:

"All the paper money you have or I'll blow you all over the place with this bomb."

"Go ahead and blow," replied Campbell.

"I mean business, buddy," the man threatened.

"So do I," Campbell shouted in wrath, and sounded the robbery alarm as he started purposefully out of his cage.

The man fled. Campbell pursued him a block, but lost him in the street throngs.
