Fletcher Repeats Instructions For Storm-Beaten Grain

Quite a number of Lane county farmers whose hay and grain were beaten down by the recent rains are making inquiries as to how to qualify for benefits under the federal agricultural conservation plan, according to O. S. Fletcher, county agent.

Mr. Fletcher this week announced through the press and through government circulars that these farmers could qualify for benefits by plowing such crops under, and immediate response was had, as these farmers are naturally anxious to get some salvage out of their ruined crops.

Up to Tuesday night, 713 Lane farmers had filed work sheets under the general provisions of the conservation plan, covering 985 farms, and these farms total 62,610 acres, which is 44.44 per cent of all crop lands in the county, according to the last government census.

The deadline for signing work sheets is July 3, and between now and that date it is expected that many more farmers will have signed the sheets. Signing imposes no obligation upon the farmer but only qualifies him to receive the benefits in the event he decides to participate in the program.

Model of Forest Camp Will Be Put On Display Here

A scale model forest camp in its natural setting will be put on display by the Willamette national forest in the window of McMorran and Washburne to acquaint local residents with the type of development that is going on in the Willamette and other national forests, Recreation Engineer W. N. Parke announced today.

The model, made to the scale of one-fourth inch to one foot, is six by 12 feet and includes all the buildings and facilities usually found in camps of its kind. It was carved by hand by workers in the Belknap CCC camps during the winter months and is complete to every detail even to the tapering of each shake used for the roofs.

Development groupings such as overnight camping areas, children's playgrounds and community picnic facilities are clearly shown, said Mr. Parke.
