168,000 EGGS IN 24 HOURS.

The Enormous Output of a Little California Town.

In Petaluma the fowl family has increased and multiplied to such an amazing extent that the town easily ranks as the most important hennery in the world. Petaluma is the town in which lives Frank Snow formerly of the East Oregonian, and now conducting a poultry journal there.

There were shipped from Petaluma last year no less than 2,500,000 dozen eggs and 30,000 dozen of poultry. As many as 14,000 eggs have been shipped from the town in one day. To feed a feathered family of such vast proportions as can be seen at Petaluma requires a supply of provender that in the last year brought to the merchants of the town $20,000 for feed alone.

To this sum must be added thousands of dollars for foodstuffs imported from San Francisco by the larger poultry raisers. One of the ranch owners will frequently go into a store in Petaluma and lay down $500, with the request that feedstuff to that value be forwarded to his hennery. Money is abundant and spot cash is the basis of trade in that vicinity.

Twenty or thirty coops of poultry are shipped every day to San Francisco. Wells-Fargo shipped through their office last year 11,000 cases of eggs, and the Petaluma Express company is handling 100 cases a day. Every one in the town is in the poultry business in some form or other. The hen certainly rules the roost in Petaluma.
