GREEK NEW COMER KNOWS FIVE WORDS IN ENGLISH TONGUE

MANHATTAN, Kan Jan. 10—"Yes" "no", "water," "father" and "mother" was the only English words known by Constantine Calogeris when he landed in the United States from Greece.

This Greek, even now none too well versed in the English language, is called by one of the professors "the best student in mathematics that ever attended the Kansas State Agricultural college." He is taking postgraduate work in mathematics—integral calculus and differential equations—yet only last semester he was struggling with sophomore English.

After completing the elementary school at the island of Imbros, off the coast of Greece, young Calogeris was faced with the possibility of being drafted in the Greek army. He came to the United States and after working at odd jobs for several years was induced by several Princeton men to come to the agricultural college.

Calogeris has been self-supporting while attending school. Until this year he earned his way by firing furnaces, waiting on tables and doing other work. Now he earns his way as a tutor in mathematics and as an assistant in the mathematics department of the college.
