BRITISH EMPIRE DIED IN 1614 SAYS SMUTS

BRITISH (8)

London, Dec. 31.—Discussing the future of the empire with special reference t the assertion of Gen Smuts that "the British Empire ceased to exist in August, 1914," the Manchester Guardian says the statement is "startling but perfectly true as a direct means of driving home the fact that the changes wrought by the war in the status and relations of the dominions have rung the death-knell of such concreted aggressive imperialism as the South African Nationalists fear."

The Guardian proceeds to argue that Downing Street's authority in the dominions is now "reduced to a shadow," and adds:

"In the new relationship on which the British people are embarking, the need for common counsel and advice will be even greater than before, but it will be a conference between nations of equal status in a sisterhood."

PUTTING THE KICK IN ENGLISH PLUM PUDDING

London, Dec. 31.—"Shoot it full of the good old stuff," said an American to a plum pudding manufacturer here today. "We are pretty dry in our home town." Taking no chances, even before they heard of the United States Supreme Court decision, a number of Americans recently have taken home with them plum puddings with a kick like a mule. By special request, sympathetic British manufacturers have been inoculating these puddings, as well as pars of mince-meat, with plenty of brandy, much more than usual, because American buyers feared some evaporation in transit.

Their actions may set such an example that the American courts may have to decide whether a plum pudding is a thirst quencher or an appetite appeaser. Some of these plum pudding enthusiasts declare that if the people back home had only known that the courts would give dry decisions there would have been such a huge importation of well spiked puddings from England that it would cause a rise in the rate of exchange.

As for old England itself, this promises to be the wettest Christmas in five years. There were long queues today in front of some whiskey emporiums, even well dressed women waiting in line to buy Christmas booze.

EGYPTIAN JEWELRY 3800 YEARS OLD DUG FROM ANCIENT TOMB

New York, Dec. 31.—Jewelry from the tomb of Sathathor-Iunut, an Egyptian Princess of the Twelfth Dynasty, about 1900 B. C., pronounced by Director Edward Robinson and Alfred M. Lythgoe, Curator of Egyptian Art, the finest collection of articles of personal adornment so far brought out of Egypt, was placed on first view yesterday in the Metropolitan Museum of Art. It will be shown one month and then, owing to its unique value, it will be stored away until the completion of a room for the safe display of gems and other rare treasures of ancient Egypt.

The Metropolitan's acquisition illustrates the finest period of Egyptian workmanship and design in jewelry. It consists of a gold necklace, inlaid with carnelian, lapis lazuli and green feldspar and another pectoral of King Senusert II, father of the Princess, similarly made; a gold collar of double lion heads, a girdle of gold, with rhombic jewelled heads, a necklace of amethyst with gold lion claw pendants, armlets and bracelets with gold bars and beads of gold, carnelian and turquoise; copper mirrors with gold handles, gold amulets with colored inlay and parts of the Princess's jewel box, made of ebony, with gold and carved ivory panels.

The tomb, with others, had been rifled by early conquerors or marauders, who took away even the mummy and the funeral jewelry trappings, but overlooked a niche containing the ornaments used during life. Prof. Petrie dug out the niche, which had filled with mud, kiln-dried under the hot sands. Now the collection looks as bright and fresh as if only recently from the maker. It is identified as belonging to the Princess by her name and the name of her father in carvings on the larger pieces, and the tomb from which the collection came was royal. According to custom, the Cairo museum retained the choice of the collection, a diadem.
