Strangest Ship In World to Be Launched Soon

London, Oct. 26.— The strangest ship in all the world will be launched from Shoreham harbor.

Nervous mariners who see it being towed along the English channel will imagine that a sort of Tower of London has drifted out to sea.

The weird craft is one of two that have been built in the shallow waters — mud flats at low tide — that do duty for a harbor at Shoreham. Incidentally they are the first ships built for centuries on this part of the coast.

Since they have been rising like two black towers against the low coastline they have been the objects of intense curiosity to every passing ship and to every landsman from Beachy Head to Bognor.

Most visitors to Brighton and Hove, from whence they can be plainly seen, wonder what they are, and are told that their purpose is a strange secret locked in the breasts of my Lords of the Admiralty, whose property they are. They have become known universally as "The Mystery Ships."

One popular view was explained by an aged waterman, who announced that they were to be sunk in mid-channel as a foundation for a bridge across to France.

Another view, fostered by the authorities to satisfy curiosity, is that they are to be used to raise sunken wrecks.

Both these opinions are wrong. When the ships were begun in June, 1918, they were to be a surprise for the Huns. Everyone who knew their purpose was sworn to secrecy, and they are still on their oath. The admiralty "declines information."

This, much, however, has been learned. The first one, to be launched very soon, will be used in the defense of the Solent.

It will be towed to a spot near the Nab lightship and there sunk to the bed of the sea. Its concrete "hull" will rest on the bottom, and the steel tower surmounting it, which is equipped with a powerful searchlight and some other technical apparatus, will rise to a height of about sixty feet above the sea level at high tide. There are quarters for a permanent "crew" of about ninety men.

Extensive preparations are being made for the launch. The entrance to the harb
