Citrus Crop Fine Quality

California - Arizona citrus growers will produce one of the finest quality crops in years during the coming season, Paul S. Armstrong, general manager of the California Fruit Growers Exchange, reported to the Board of Directors at the annual meeting of the marketing cooperative today.

"All estimates point to excellent fruit quality and larger orange sizes, particularly on navels. It is too early to estimate valencias," Armstrong stated. "This is very encouraging after the tremendous loss in volume and reduced quality as a result of the freezing weather of last winter."

The effect of the damaging cold weather were reflected in every phase of citrus industry activity, the Sunkist general manager reported.

"It is estimated that 46,000 carloads of fruit in California and Arizona were destroyed by the freeze," Armstrong said. "The volume lost was equivalent to 32 per cent of production."

Because of the substantially reduced volume of fruit, price levels were higher this year than last, particularly on lemons. In the case of oranges and grapefruit, however, the increased returns per box did not offset the lower volume of shipments and the high cost of orchard heating added to other high cultural handling costs.

"While total fob returns for the year just closed were only 6 percent less than the previous year, costs were much higher and the grower who lost all or most of his crop was in distress," Armstrong said.

Despite monetary restrictions in most countries of the world, the export business of the Exchange totaled one million boxes during the season. The bulk of this volume was in small size oranges, helping to relieve the oversupply of small fruit on the domestic market.
