FISH ARE NOT PARTICULAR.

They Care for Quantity, Not Quality, and Always Take Water in Theirs.

"It is a well-established fact in natural history," says a man well posted on the subject, "that fish have two chief occupations. One is to eat and the other is to avoid being eaten. Few persons have had occasion to actually observe the voraciousness of fish. Fish are not particular as to what they eat when hungry. I have seen a half-pound trout swallow a quarter of a pound trout. I have found in the stomach of a codfish weighing eight pounds a block of wood as large as my hand. There was found in the stomach of a codfish that was taken at Gloucester, not so very long ago, a pack of playing-cards. How the codfish found the cards no one has ever been able to surmise."

"I have found in the stomach of a striped bass which weighed twelve pounds another striped bass weighing four pounds. And, astonishing as it may seem, there were found in the same fish nine menhaden and a few other small fish. A few weeks ago there was found in the stomach of a fish caught off the coast of England a long iron bolt.

"Probably the greediest of all, is the 'black swallower,' as it is popularly termed. This fish can perform the exceedingly impossible feat of swallowing another fish from eight to twelve times larger than itself. Its true habitation seems to be at a depth of about 1,500 fathoms. It has an elongated body of nearly uniform thickness from the head nearly to the tail. The skin is destitute of scales, the mouth is very deeply cleft, extending behind the eyes, and reminds you of the chestnut about the boy who was said to have so large a mouth that when he opened it the top of his head was an island. The peculiarity of the swallower's mouth is that some of the teeth, all of which are long and sharply pointed, are movable. Let the swallower espy a fish many times larger than itself and it darts upon its victim like a flash, seizes it be the tail, and gradually climbs over it with its jaws, first advancing one jaw and then the other. As the victim is taken in the swallower's stomach it appears as a great bag projecting out far backward and forward. The walls of the stomach are so tightly stretched that they are transparent, and the species of the fish taken in may be discovered. Such rapacity is often more than the captor can back up by digestion, and the swallower is forced upward from the depths to the surface of the ocean, where it may be picked up. In this way specimens of this rare fish have been obtained and sent to the National museum at Washington.
