FINE RUSSIAN $500 AND 6 MONTHS JAIL

Charged with the illegal possession of moonshine, Pete Rodakowski, a member of the Russian colony near Springfield, was fined $500 and sentenced to six months in jail by Judge Jesse O. Wells in justice court this morning. Rodakowski, who has long been suspected a leader in the liquor dealings in the Russian colony, has a wife and nine children. The oldest child is only 13 years of age.

Rodakowski was arrested Friday evening near his home in Deputy Sheriffs Rodney Roach and Earl Humphreys after he had mistaken the officers for customers. Five gallons of moonshine, which he was delivering to his customers, were located. The officers approached the Russians home in an automobile, and Rodakowski came to the road with the gallon jars of the brew in a gunny sack.

It is believed that Rodakowski has been operating a still on his farm but the officers have been unable to find it.

Several members of the Russian colony have served jail sentences for illegal possession of booze. Rodakowski is scheduled to join the prison gang at Steilacoom after his release.

Governor Pierce Tells of the Great Saving Made

Dallas, April 21.—Presenting an account of his stewardship as governor, Walter M. Pierce was eloquent and appealing in his talk Thursday night at the big Dallas armory gathering featured by the commercial club.

Even though he had made two previous speeches in the county during the day one at the Monmouth normal and later at the county gathering of the farmers' union, Governor Pierce was in splendid form and his voice, which is generally the case with him.

Says Saving Made.

In a well prepared address that showed careful preparation and through familiarity through frequent delivery, the governor told of his efforts to cut down state taxes. He said that the state levy has been reduced $1,000,000 already and that if the people will repeal the income tax, the legislature passes inheritance tax and other measures that then he good and not spend any more money than in the past, it will be possible to reduce the present state levy from $2,000,000 a year to almost nothing. In this connection he denied that he stated during the campaign that taxes could be reduced one half.

Throughout the talk the governor kept the big crowd in good humor by telling stories having a real point. In his plea for considerate treatment and for judgment he asked that all reports coming through the newspapers from Salem be considered in their true light of a child being weaned and crying to get to its mother. Those entrusted with the affairs of the state, he said, were anxious to get at the truth of the state.

Big Crowd Present.

The gathering was one of the biggest and best in the history of Dallas. Every seat was occupied. The service was cafeteria style, with the result that it was much quicker than would be the other way have been the case. The food was abundant and the social feature was more than ordinary note. This was particularly true of the community singing led by John W. Orr, with Mrs. F. M. Dutrich at the piano. All the songs were parodies on well known old time tunes, with the result that the singing was more than ordinarily participated in.

LITTLE TALKS ON THRIFT

By S. W. STRAUS,

President American Society for Thrift

S. W. STRAUS

TO THE American who visits the Mediterranean countries the fact stands out quite clearly that America should be more alert commercially in these regions. Other nations, notably Great Britain, are getting themselves strongly intrenched in the Near East from the standpoint of trade and commerce.

At home we produce so much more than we consume that it is in keeping with national thrift and efficiency that we find an outlet for our products wherever possible.

The political situation in the Near East is, of course, not yet stabilized, but sooner or later things will settle down and America should be in a position to compete with all other nations for the rich trade of these lands.

One cannot visit these countries, many of which have a civilization as ancient as the oldest document of human history, without being impressed with the fact that the younger generations are adopting a new viewpoint toward life. These people are today weighed down with traditions and customs entirely out of step with modern progress. But the young people are becoming imbued with the ideals of Western Europe.

Closer commercial contact with America would be beneficial to these people as an educational influence. It would, among other things teach them the superiority of modern efficiency in business as compared with their own archaic methods.

There are many phases of thrift. The development of broader markets for American products would mean the elimination of much waste at home. And it would also mean the introduction of thriftier methods abroad, because as we become greater sellers we also become both greater buyers and greater teachers.

Difficulties Are Met in Filming Wild Animals

By Peter P. Carney
Editor National Sports Syndicate.

The clever achievements of African photographs in "Hunting Big Game in Africa" being shown throughout the country are appreciated by everybody. But only those versed in the subject are aware of the extraordinary difficulties that were successfully overcome, Sidney Snow, the cinematographer, states:

"The fact that most animals are nocturnal in their habits makes it a tough job to get the day time pictures. Lions, leopards and other junglers of prey must be tracked to their midday resting places, routed out by the native safari ants and brush beaters, then the cameraman must take his chances of keeping up with the pursuit and of filming the animal often almost invisible in the tall grass. Our picture of the five lionesses and their cubs shows it can be done, but it's tough, tiring work.

"We also located and rounded up with the clever ant plains creatures that range in herds for protection, like the giraffes, the zebras, mules and antelopes. I carried a camera equipped with a variety of lenses and mounted with a revolving turret. This I took with me in the car and chased the herds from all sides. Eventually they would tire and let us get near. But the giraffes with their long necks enabled them to fight us over the tops of trees, and the zebras for three months. Eventually the shot was fired, they lost their swiftness and their tired legs refused to carry them further.

No Easy Task

"With the camera task finished one afternoon or evening to decide at the waterholes another procedure was necessary. We would go during the moonlit hours, motionless for hours and days, suffering much from heat and insects, while waiting a chance for some of those realistic closeups. Often the oncoming darkness would foil our efforts. Sometimes we would have to keep the animals from quenching the water for several nights, running in orders to make them so thirsty that we would come in the early morning when pictures could be made.

Another trick: Sometimes hunting animals. Evening to the leeward of the quarry. A shifting wind gives the animal your scent, and he is flown upon you! On several critical occasions I escaped by quick side jump while I had plugged the charging brute. Both in the rhino and the elephant hunts, the native boys had long since taken to the tops of the trees. Without any egotism I think I may say that only a person fully conversant with Wild Nature is fitted to go into the jungles after pictures; we had a number of professional cinema men with us at the start, but they could not stand the gaff."

Sidney Snow was the fellow who took the bulk of the pictures on the Snow Expedition to Africa in behalf of the Oakland (Cal.) Museum. The expedition left San Francisco in 1919 and returned in 1922, covering 80,000 miles and returning with the finest collection of mammals, birds and eggs ever brought from Africa. Snow leaves for another two-year tour in Africa this month.

"Shanghaied" in Shanghai Airedale Mascot of Liner Does Come Back

"Paddy" and Surgeon of President Grant.

Seattle, Wash.—You can't keep a good man down, runs the old adage, not according to Dr. Edward Stroubert, surgeon of the Admiral Oriental liner, President Grant, can you keep an Airedale dog away from his master. Dr. Stroubert claims, with other authorities on dogdom, that the Airedale is a one man animal, and that no matter how far away one may be taken from his master, he will make every effort to return, and generally succeeds.

In proof of this contention, the surgeon points with pride to his pet Airedale, "Paddy," who enjoys the distinction of having been "Shanghaied" in Shanghai, kept captive for weeks, and of escaping and returning to the surgeon aboard the President Grant.

"Paddy," who has been owned by the surgeon since his early puppyhood, recently completed his eighth trip from Seattle to Shanghai on the President Grant. While the President Grant was docked in Shanghai the Airedale was stolen.

The entire time the Admiral Oriental liner lay in port the surgeon and other officers of the vessel spent all their available time searching for Paddy, but without success. The President Grant sailed for Seattle without Paddy, and with Dr. Stroubert grieving the loss of his pet.

That the dog must have been kept tied up, while the search for it was on, was believed by the surgeon, who knew, that if free, the smart animal would speedily have found his way back to the ship. When the President Grant arrived at Seattle, friends offered other dogs to the surgeon, but he refused them, feeling that no other pet could take Paddy's place, and fostering the hope that he might yet find the latter in the Chinese port.

Headed again for the Orient, Dr. Stroubert planned to offer an attractive reward for the return of his dog, and had the ship's printer get up a big poster to that effect, with a large photograph of Paddy featured on it.

When the President Grant drew alongside the wharf, Dr. Stroubert, package of posters in hand, stood on deck ready to go ashore to renew his search for the Airedale, the moment gangplank was in place. As the lines were cast go the wharf, the siren blew sharply warning of the end of the trip.

Hardly had the echo of the shrieking whistle died away, and the hawsers made fast, than dirty and bedraggled, with a long piece of rope hanging from his collar, there appeared Paddy, apparently responding to the signal, running madly down the pier. The gangplank was placed and the dog, never hesitating a second, dashed aboard the President Grant, leaping all over Dr. Stroubert.

That night there was a dinner aboard ship, with Paddy the prodigal the guest of honor, sharing his attention between a huge stuffed bone and his master, the surgeon.
