CHEERING FIGURES

According to [illegible] Homes Finance [illegible] Can you see as great as [illegible] experienced. These figures, as published in the Christian Science Monitor give comparative prices of Civil War days and the present for a number of staples. Before the Civil War sugar sold at 14 cents a dozen. During the war they rose to 46 cents a dozen. The average wholesale price of eggs for the past three months has been 39 cents. Now, applying the Civil War increase to the average price before the present war, eggs would be worth eggs selling at $1.31 a dozen wholesale, or as much as $1.61 retail. Even one without honey have concluded as such chloch as that.

The average price for flour at 1916 was $8.37 a barrel. During the Civil War it reached $17. Translating this into modern terms, it would be $26.37 a barrel instead of the average wholesale rate of $9.80.

The food administration has made no pretensions at giving us cheap food. It haven't the power to regulate food prices if it would. It has from the first asserted that its primary business was to see to it that there was food at all to be obtained, to see that it was distributed as fairly as possible and to keep it any of the [illegible] of speculation. Prices were secondary matter. And even so, they have been kept down considerably.
