Conservation Values Of Grass Outlined In New Circular

Ways to use grass as a conservation tool are listed in a new circular published by the Oregon State college extension service.

Grass and legumes, planted together, form a "holding corporation" to hold soil firmly against erosion, the circular points out. This combination also helps build back organic matter that may have been lost from the soil, and enriches the land for following crops.

Illustrations in the circular show what can happen to land when the grass cover is lost, and point out how land can be recovered through correct use of grass and legumes. The circular's author, E. R. Jackman, OSC extension range crop specialist, also lists a variety of ways to develop and manage grasslands for maximum soil protection.

Oregon residents can get a copy of the circular, titled "Grass as a Conservation Tool," from their local county extension office or from the OSC bulletin clerk, Corvallis.
