Comment on the Day's News

By FRANK JENKINS

LATE Wednesday evening. Headed for Buck Williams' Yamsey ranch to spend Thanksgiving.

Snowing like the dickens, and looks like it might even be even more so by morning. Might even get snowed in and couldn't get back to work.

Lady Luck does tap one on the shoulder now and then.

CHILOQUIN. Snowing harder than ever, and have to put on the chains. Chilling thought: Are they in the car, where they OUGHT to be, or back in the garage, where they're LIKELY to be?

A miracle happens. The chains are in the car. They don't fit, of course, but clever mechanic in the garage makes them fit.

Lady Luck is still in a rosy mood.

CLIMBING Yamsey mountain, with the snow getting steadily deeper every hundred yards. Lights loom ahead. Two trucks approach and have to be passed, in a road too narrow for passing.

"I've been traveling this road for 20 years," Buck mutters, "and never met a car on this mountain before."

Maybe he never traveled it before at night, in a hurry, in the teeth of a gathering snowstorm.

It makes a difference, you know.

TRUCKS finally passed, even though the road is too narrow for two cars and the snow too deep to permit getting out of the rut. These things seem to get themselves done when they have to be done.

On into the night, and over the mountain. Other cars passed, in the same way as before. No cussing. Everybody good-natured.

It's the night before Thanksgiving.

LIGHTS loom again—this time the welcome lights of the ranch house.

Out of the cars, and up onto the porch of a long, low building; stamping the snow from shoes. Doors swing hospitably wide into a long, low room, beamed and paneled, lighted by the dancing flames of an open fire in a vast fireplace.

Warm, rich rugs on the floors. Deep, comfortable chairs all around. Books and magazines.

Such things DO exist outside the movies and the short stories, after all.

NEXT morning. Sun shining bright, on a world new-made and white and pure. Every tree a Christmas tree, spangled in a way that human hands can't imitate.

Hope of getting snowed in and being unable to get back to work gone where the woodbine twineth, but the glitter of the sun on the snow, the blue of the cloudless sky overhead and the line of the distant hills back of the pasture below the ranch house worth even the dashing of that bright hope.

YAMSEY Ranch lies at the head of the Williamson—the very head of it, where the springs that are its source gush out from under the hill.

Asked as to the number of deeded acres it contains, Buck replies vaguely: "Oh, about 3,000, I guess. No, it must be nearer 4,000."

If you grew up, as did this writer, in a country where land holdings are reckoned carefully in terms of fractional acres, you'll get a brief vision from this reply of the vastness of things out in these wide open spaces.

Especially when it is added that in addition to the three or four thousand deeded acres some 100,000-odd leased acres are grazed over.

IF THERE'S a beauty spot ANYWHERE, it's this Yamsey ranch, with its buildings set at the head of the open valley through which wanders the Williamson, cold and clear and fresh from the great springs that are its source, with Mt. Scott and the very tip of Thielsen showing on the horizon and the dark pine forest in the background.

BREAKFAST of bacon and eggs and toast and coffee and grapefruit and about everything good.

A day spent in seeing the ranch, with its wide meadows, its fat and contented cattle, its streams so clear that the trout can be seen like goldfish in a bowl—in the morning by automobile and in the afternoon by saddle horse. Evening and the appetite that follows a day in the sharp, clear air of the high country.

Thanksgiving Day, indeed.

State Land Fire Loss

SALEM, Dec. 1.—(AP)—Forest fire losses for the year 1934 on lands under the jurisdiction of the state forestry department were less than for any season during the past 13 years. The total monetary loss has been placed at $123,453, State Forester Lynn F. Cronemiller said today.

This Little Piggie No Road Hog

"Pigs is pigs, but road hogs should read the rules," says little Norma Shafer, who would like to see other companies follow the lead of General Petroleum Corporation in its efforts to reduce traffic accidents, by making safe driving compulsory among their employees.

No, Norma Shafer's little piggie is not a road-hog; just a little farmyard hog, she says, that never hurt anybody and never will, which is the main reason why it differs from the road-hog.

HIGH TRAFFIC TOLL

Norma, who posed the above picture originally for the Western Livestock Journal, and all little kiddies like her, are the potential victims of the careless driver, accident statistics show. So high is the traffic toll becoming with each succeeding year, in spite of heavy fines and penalties for traffic violations, that many of the leading industrial organizations are flocking to the support of the authorities with safe driving campaigns of their own.

Notable among these is the General Petroleum Corporation, marketers of Mobiloil and Mobilgas and proud possessor of one of the highest national safety records for several years past. According to information received from A. L. Knipping, Jr., of the company's Central Safety Committee, General has just prepared and is now distributing to its employees throughout the Pacific Coast region a Manual on Safe Driving.

CRASHES REDUCED

This manual, which has been highly commended by several chiefs of police, points out that approximately one-in-three traffic accidents is caused by violation of the right-of-way, a direct indictment of the road-hog. General Petroleum drivers are instructed to take no chances, to give the other fellow, pedestrian or driver, the right-of-way even when it is not legally his. In addition, every rule of the road imposed by municipal, county or state laws must be rigidly observed.

These company instructions, which have been in force for years, have almost eliminated traffic accidents from the company's records, Knipping claims.
