BIRDS AND BEASTS HOPE NEXT YEAR WILL BE BETTER

Shortages of Food and Fuel Make 1943 Uncomfortable —Horses Escape Threat.

By Nick Bourne
United Press Staff Correspondent

San Francisco, Dec. 28—(U.P.) Year's end, 1943, finds America's friends in furs and feathers, their way of life changed by the war, patriotically slugging it out with food, fuel and family problems, a barnyard, bird cage and zoo survey revealed today.

The outstanding event which did not happen in the animal kingdom was the widely-heralded threat of the human race to eat up the horses.

Dogs, cats and denizens of the nation's zoos did switch to horse meat rations, but children who cried as they re-read "Black Beauty" wasted their tears. Americans generally were spared the horse meat ordeal.

An owner of a pet turtle with a cold house cleverly parked the turtle under the hot water heater to complete a comfortable hibernation.

Bad for Birds

Canaries generally had a bad year. Imported bird seed was so scarce that many a bold ceased to chirp, got circles under the eyes when feathers fell out from the roup.

In the barnyard, mass drownings of day-old roosters followed a government decree stressing hen production for more eggs.

Cows, sorely pressed to fill the unprecedented wartime demand for milk, cream and cheese, had probably the most uncomfortable year in history. It would have been unpatriotic to kick the pail over, so bossie had to put up with being milked by any jerk who answered the dairymen's call for manpower.

Skunk Craze

Skunks increased in popularity as household pets, following magazine articles on their virtues, but the craze subsided somewhat when many of the deodorization operations backfired.

Metal bird cages became scarce, but parrots' vocabularies showed great improvement with the increase of sailors.

Rats, which historically have followed the trade routes, came to America's shores in great numbers. Red Nichols, the hot cornetist, failed to Pied Piper them out of Albany, Calif., and many other cities tried novel ideas on the rats.

People thought twice before buying St. Bernard puppies and smaller pets were in great demand. Common, or alley, kittens, often drowned before the war, attained an historic dignity by becoming, for the first time, a commodity to be sold in some pet shops for $1 up.

In zoos, monkeys and tropical birds had to get along without bananas. There was a shortage of fish for trained seals and the first recorded twin giraffes born in captivity died.

Forty-three bull elk were killed, three by women, in California's first elk season in 60 years, during December.
