Road Agent Plys Trade at Outskirts of the City.

TAKES COIN AND WATCH

J. W. Wintermute, a plumber and a resident of Arleta; his wife, and his mother-in-law, were held up by a lone, masked highwayman near Mount Taber reservoir at 10 o'clock last night while driving toward their home in a buggy, and at the muzzle of a big old-fashioned revolver that looked as if it did duty in the stage coach days, Wintermute was compelled to get down from his seat and deliver $14 and a gold watch. The women were not molested.

OBJECTION TO "FONETIK" LINES.

PORTLAND, Aug. 4.—(To the Editor.)—Will you allow me to make an objection to W. S. Varnum's late editorial in The Oregonian? I will not quarrel with him about his "mistake" only in the pronunciation. We should use only about 5 per cent of the short "i" to 100 per cent of the "u"; then it will do. He says that the words in his letter are spelled "fonetically" as far as our "defectively redundant alphabet" will permit. Now, I say "the" does not spell "the." Again one of our sounds of "o" is "oo," as in "move." We use it in "go" and "to." Why not "ho" for "who"?

ROAD AGENT PLYS TRADE AT OUTSKIRTS OF THE CITY.

A peculiar circumstance of the hold-up was that it was committed four blocks outside the city limits and the police technically have no jurisdiction. This was not taken into consideration, however, and efforts will be made to capture the highwayman.

TAKES COIN AND WATCH

In true road agent style, the masked highwayman carried out his plans. Hiding in the brush until the buggy with its three occupants was almost upon him, the masked man stepped into the road, took the horse by the bit, and presenting his big revolver, commanded the driver to keep quiet. The highwayman apologized to the two women for delaying their journey but insisted that Wintermute turn the lines over to one of the women and get down to the ground. Turning his victim so that he could cover the women with his revolver if necessary, the masked man compelled Wintermute to throw up his hands and submit to being robbed.
