Funds and Attractive Policy Goals of GOP

WASHINGTON, Dec. 10 (AP)—Republicans tackle next week the dual problem of financing a 1950 campaign and finding a program that will lure voters to their candidates.

In New York Monday a finance committee headed by Sinclair Weeks, Massachusetts national committeeman, will check over the party's plummeting bank balance and its lagging contributions.

In Chicago the next day a 23-member strategy committee headed by Arthur Summerfield, Michigan national committeeman, will see what can be done about making republicans more attractive to the voters.

Close

The two problems seemed so closely linked that some republicans regard them as inseparable.

A national committeeman who didn't want to be quoted by name explained it this way:

Prospective big money donors want the party to take an all-out stand against what President Truman calls his "Fair Deal" program. These donors say that otherwise they won't contribute to the kitty.

On the other hand, many party leaders won't think they can entice the average voter into their corner merely by being against everything the administration proposes.

Poor Party

The strategy committee's decisions are likely to be influenced by the financial outlook. Unless contributions rise the GOP may be forced into a poor man's campaign in next year's battle for control of congress.

Guy G. Gabrielson, the GOP national chairman, already has taken a step in this direction.

He has called for mass Lincoln Day dinners at $1 per head at which the object will be to get the people out to hear the republican side of the question instead of trying to raise money as the democrats do with $100 a plate Jefferson-Jackson spreads.

Democratic National Chairman William Boyle said yesterday that his party's annual affair here February 16 will be something of a mass affair itself. President Truman will deliver his Jefferson-Jackson day address at the big National Guard armory, instead of in a local hotel.

Policy Report

Gabrielson is expected to lay before the GOP strategy group a report on the response to his query to republicans on issuing a party policy statement for the campaign.

Congress members who once opposed that idea seem to be falling in behind the proposal.

While the republicans generally talked of next year's campaign, a brand new senator looked ahead to 1952.

Harry Darby, who will be sworn in next month to succeed the late republican Senator Clyde Reed of Kansas, said he wouldn't be surprised to see General Dwight D. Eisenhower become a candidate for the GOP presidential nomination.

Popular

Darby, who is likely to control the Kansas delegation to the 1952 nominating convention as national committeeman from that state, said Eisenhower enjoys widespread popularity in Kansas.

"While there is no favorite son movement yet," Darby added, "there would be a lot of interest and sentiment for him."

Eisenhower, a native of Abilene, Kas., has said he isn't interested in any political job.

But the general's recent speeches blasting those who think more about security than individual initiative have convinced some democrats including President Truman that Eisenhower would be open for the GOP presidential nomination if it came his way.

WATER SHORTAGE MAKES BIG SPLASH—Residents of drought-ridden Roosevelt, N. J., draw their ration of water from an Army truck sent from Fort Monmouth, N. J., after the town's two artesian wells went dry. Water shortage worries many cities in the East. New York faces a three-year drought. Cincinnati, O., Philadelphia, Baltimore, Jersey City, New Brunswick, N. J., and Memphis are among the bigger cities facing drastic water shortages. If water continues to disappear at its present rate, authorities say vast areas of the U. S. might become desert wastelands.
