'A' Company Met Death On Dog Green Beach

By TOM A. CULLEN

OMAHA BEACH, Normandy (NEA)—"Guide on the church steeple," the men were told as they pitched and tossed in the landing craft waiting for H-Hour and the signal to assault Omaha Beach.

The white spire of Vierville's stout, stone church was to guide Company A of the 116th Infantry in landing on the most murderous sector of the invasion beach.

Fifteen years ago, as D-Day dawned, the steeple suddenly appeared against the lightening sky as a warning finger.

Some of the men in the landing craft were seasick and vomited into paper bags that had been thoughtfully provided. Others cracked jokes to ease the nervous tension. All of them were scared.

But the men of A Company were young and full of life. Besides, not a single enemy shot had yet been fired.

"I can see my old white-haired grandmother standing on the porch and waving my insurance policy," one of them quipped as he peered at the shore. The laughter was hollow.

Twenty minutes after the ramps were lowered, A Company of the 116th Infantry had become an inert, headless mess, cut to pieces by mortar and machine gun fire. Two-thirds of the men, including every officer and sergeant, had been either killed or wounded.

The casualties included the soldier who thought he saw his grandmother waving his insurance policy.

This is how it was on Omaha Beach 15 years ago. But it could just as easily have been 150 years ago, or even 500 years ago, so remote are these events to the nuclear age.

It could have been the Battle of Verdun or of Vicksburg, or even Agincourt fought on St. Crispin's Day in 1415, so obsolete the weapons and tactics used on Omaha Beach.

Did men really fight like that? we ask. Is it true that some men stood neck-deep in water to be fired at, too paralyzed by fear to dash for the shore? That others clawed at the gravel with their finger-nails and came near to being pushed by the enemy back into the sea?

Omaha Beach was probably the last of the Big Parades, as infantry battles are sometimes called, and the infantrymen who fought there, the last of their kind.

They have more in common with the frontier scout, the minuteman or even the crossbowman at Agincourt, than with the warrior of the future, the nuclear warhead technician in his decontamination suit.

On Dog Green, the Army's code name for the beach section where A Company landed, D-Day now seems as unreal as a faded snapshot in the family album.

The only occupant of Dog Green when I visited it the other day was a French sculptor, busy putting the finishing touches to a memorial to the 116th Infantry Regiment on the spot where they landed 15 years ago. It was a red granite slab, and hideously ugly.

His eyes protected by goggles, he was chiseling a bas-relief of infantrymen tumbling over one another in a graceful, forward movement up the beach. More like professional acrobats than foot soldiers, I thought, but I withheld my opinion.

Pushing his goggles back on his forehead, the sculptor accepted one of my cigarettes.

"Before the war, M'sieu," he began, "this beach was dotted with villas with bright, tiled roofs. There was even a casino. It was the kind of seaside resort where businessmen sent their wives for the summer.

"Now, as you see," he said gesturing with his chisel, "there is only wasteland. No one has attempted to rebuild. There are too many ghosts out there on the beach, M'sieu," he added, replacing the goggles.

Indeed, Dog Green has a blasted, withered look about it. It has yet to be re-consecrated for the living.

Before the invasion, the Germans razed some of the villas in order to get unobstructed fields of fire for their guns. On the tidelands where children once played with sand buckets they drove thick wooden stakes with mines attached and planted hedgehogs made of iron girders welded together to form double tripods.

On the grassy slopes where holiday-makers once picnicked they sowed minefields, and into the sides of the bluff they built pillboxes and bunkers with 20 feet of concrete protecting them on the seaward side. Inside their concrete bunkers the Germans were waiting when A Company landed.

Nothing happened until the landing craft started the run-in to the beach; then all hell broke loose.

One of the six boats was blown to bits by mortar fire. Another foundered, and men were seen jumping overboard and being dragged down by their equipment. The remaining four grounded on a sandbar in 4 to 6 feet of water.

The ramps went down and the men started off the craft in three files, center file first and the flanks peeling left and right. The Germans opened up with intense automatic fire, the bullets whipping the surf to a froth. Then all order was lost.

Some men dove over the sides to escape the criss-cross fire. Their heavy equipment dragged them down. Others were wounded in the water and were drowned, their piteous screams ending in gurgles.

Still others moved safely through the bulletfire to the sand only to be driven back into the water for cover by the deadly machine gun and mortar fire. They crouched there behind the iron hedgehogs, only their heads showing.

Some of the survivors stayed in the water all morning, finally succeeded in reaching the sea wall by crawling up with the tide.

Within 20 minutes of striking the beach A Company had ceased to be an assault company. It had become a forlorn rescue party bent upon survival and rescuing the wounded, many of whom were being drowned by the rising tide.

Similar opposition was encountered on Fox Green and the eastern sectors of Omaha Beach where two battalions of the 16th Infantry Regiment landed at 6:30 a.m. But none was so terrible as Dog Green.

When I returned up the beach the French sculptor was still at work on his ugly red granite monument. It will be unveiled tomorrow (June 6), the 15th anniversary of D-Day, and M. the Sous-Prefet of the Department of Calvados will probably be there, ribbon sash, medals and all.

After a few well-chosen words, the brass band of the Republican Guard will play. And then everyone will repair to a restaurant in Bayeux for a slap-up meal and get gloriously sozzled on champagne.

And, somehow, D-Day and the Battle of Normandy will recede in an alcoholic haze, as will the men of the 116th Infantry, the 16th Infantry, the 2nd and 5th Rangers, and all the others who made the initial assault.

"At the firemen's ball everybody dances but the firemen," is an old French proverb. If it's any consolation to the men who lie buried on the cliff-top overlooking Omaha Beach, D-Day may well have been the last ball.

They, certainly, are the last firemen, a noble breed whom mankind has used badly as often as it has well.

CLOUDY CRYSTAL BALL

HOLLYWOOD (UPI)—Ben Piazza, 24, who makes his movie debut in "The Hanging Tree," collected his personal equivalent of an Oscar when his former high school drama teacher, Mrs. Etheline Walker, wired him: "Couldn't be happier to have been so completely wrong." She once told him he was not cut out to be an actor.
