Optimism Shining In PCC Picture

SEATTLE (AP) — Optimism is beginning to replace the dark doubts that assailed the "Little 4" colleges left stranded and unwanted when the Pacific Coast Conference disbanded in May.

Oregon, Washington State, Oregon State and Idaho were snubbed when California, UCLA, Washington and Southern California organized the Athletic Assn. of Western Universities and nicknamed themselves the "Big 4". Stanford, invited to make it a Big 5, thus far has declined.

The breakup — climax of several seasons of quarreling — was a kick in the financial pants for the northern schools other than Washington.

Oregon and Washington State were chopped off the football schedules of UCLA and Southern California; Oregon State was divorced by UCLA; California will drop all three in 1961. These games were budget balancers for the northerners.

Oregon State filled its 1959 gap by signing with Texas Tech. A date with the Air Force Academy and a quickly arranged home-and-home series with Washington State filled Oregon's program. Only Washington State was unable to schedule more than nine games for 1959, and all these are in the West.

Idaho had not been meeting the California schools in football and did not have to scramble for fill-in games on short notice.

But the real blow comes with the loss of the Rose Bowl and the split of all television receipts. Division of television money among the conference members went out with the breakup — and the Little 4 gets few TV assignments. The Rose Bowl pact continues through the 1960 games and then the Big 4 takes control of this juicy plum.

A spokesman for one northern school said the loss will be about $80,000 a year each for three institutions and half that for Idaho, which received a half-share of any conference playoffs. Rose Bowl full shares are about $26,000; the rest has been TV income.

Stanford also stands to lose its share if it remains outside the Big 4, but it was not sliced off the grid schedules of its California neighbors.

"I was pessimistic at first," says Stan Bates, athletic director at Washington State. "Now I'm optimistic. Our future football schedules show steady improvement with teams like Missouri, Texas and Indiana in the picture."

Oregon and Oregon State also have adopted a nationwide outlook. In the next four seasons Oregon will meet such teams as Michigan, Minnesota, Ohio State and Texas, in addition to its usual games with Far Western teams. Oregon State has Iowa, Syracuse, Houston and West Virginia among its future opponents.

Athletic Director Leo Harris says Oregon's football schedule through 1964 promises to more than make up the losses from the conference crackup.

"I'm always a pessimist," admits athletic director Spec Keene of Oregon State, "but I feel much better than I did. I believe we actually will improve our financial position with our new football schedules. But any school is better off belonging to a conference."

The three other exiles agree. There have been no efforts to form a northern all-sport conference, although preliminary steps were taken to fashion a basketball circuit with Seattle University and Portland U. as members. Bob Gibb, Idaho's athletic director, has pushed strongly for a basketball league.

The schedules in sports other than football were not severely damaged, except for the loss of conference championship possibilities. Along with Washington, the northern schools operated as a Northern Division of the old conference and are continuing to schedule on this regional basis. Relations with Washington have not been severed.

The one major step taken by the Little 4 upon the breakup of the conference was adoption of the so-called "free ride" for athletes. This provides tuition, board and room, plus the right to earn up to $15 a month on a campus job.
