Useless Limbs, Stilled Heart Jolted Into Activity By Electric Shocks

By HAROLD SHEEHAN
Newspaper Enterprise Assn.

NEW YORK (NEA) — Medical scientists, as they slowly decipher the body's strange electrical circuitry, are now successfully playing the role of "emergency linemen." They are shocking useless limbs into action, jolting unused muscles back to activity and saving life by electrically stimulating the heart to pump blood.

One dramatic use of electricity in medicine has eased the lives of hemiplegic sufferers — persons who are paralyzed on one side of their bodies as a result of damage to the central nervous system.

WALKING WIRES — Muscle stimulator gets its power from batteries worn around waist. When momentum lifts heel of "useless" leg, switch is turned on, sending light shock to muscle on shin. Foot is lifted, brought forward and down, shutting current. Larger dark patch behind knee is ground electrode.

Because one leg of the hemiplegic will not accept the brain's command to bend, walking is usually accomplished with the aid of a brace. The walk, at best, is a drag-and-shuffle gait.

Now, according to Electronics World magazine, a firm called the Theratron Corp. is producing a muscle stimulator which, in effect, tricks the useless leg into obeying a command such as the nerves would pass to it, if they could.

In practice, an electrode — a "hot" wire — is attached with an elastic garter next to the shin's dorsi-flexor muscle. This is the foot-lifting muscle which, when tightened, produces the lift and carry-through motion of the leg.

Another electrode, a ground wire, is pasted on the skin nearby. A battery pack and stimulator weighing less than a pound is attached to the waist.

When an electrical impulse is received from the batteries the muscle jerks the foot upward. As the foot lands on the ground, a switch pad in the heel of the shoe shuts off the current. With a step forward by the other leg, the heel lifts, flipping on the current to repeat the cycle.

A side advantage to electronic walking is that the muscles continue to receive exercise and do not shrink into lifelessness. Also, the artificial stimulation may "reeducate" the limb so that normal control in some cases may be restored in time.

Medical diagnosticians can also use electricity to test for the death of nerves in a muscle more accurately than in the past. Healthy tissue will not respond to a slowly rising current. This ability to adapt to electrical stimulation is known as accommodation. Muscles in which the nerves are dead, however, have no such ability to absorb current. These muscles will contract at the slightest stimulation, revealing that something is wrong.

The most important set of muscles in the human body is the heart, also obedient to artificial stimulation.

Heart arrest may take either of two forms, fibrillation or standstill. With fibrillation the heart muscles contract at random instead of in ordered sequence. The standstill is just that; they do not contract at all.

The medical "lineman" must move fast in either instance. An instrument known as a defibrillator may be used in the first case. Electrodes simply held to the chest by the doctor can deliver a jolt or current to the heart which will place the heart at standstill, from which it may recover spontaneously or be triggered into beating by a pulse generator.

This latter instrument, called a pacemaker, is the one used for victims of standstill heart attacks. Its rhythmic electrical stimulation often gets the heart beating normally.

Some heart patients, however, are constantly in need of the pacemaker's life - giving electricity. Early efforts consisted of strapping the electrodes to the chest, but the power needed was so great people with bad hearts were fatigued just carrying the batteries around to operate the machine which operated their heart muscles.

The breakthrough came with the development of a pacemaker which could be implanted in the body. Since the electrodes could be attached directly to the heart muscles, the power output of 10 mercury cell batteries was enough. The whole unit is about as big as a package of cigarettes and half an inch thick.

The batteries last about five years before they are removed and replaced by a fresh unit.

Oil Starts Alturas Fire

ALTURAS — Fire broke out in the boiler room of the Alturas Steam Laundry and Cleaners Monday afternoon at 3 p.m. The fire, according to Shinyu Yamagata, cleaning foreman, was started by oil in the boiler room. The prompt action of the Alturas Volunteer Fire Department contained the fire to the boiler room, preventing more extensive damage. Smoke damage and demolition of the boiler room will bring the damage to nearly $5,000.

According to a first survey of the boiler room after the fire was controlled, the boiler is undamaged but a new boiler room will have to be constructed.

At first there was a danger of explosion from the flames and intensive heat near the cleaning compounds, but the firemen were able to put the fire out so rapidly that it prevented this additional loss.

The Alturas Laundry is owned by Mr and Mrs. Cal Cook of Alturas.
