Red Cross Staff Closes Basin Disaster Office

National Red Cross disaster relief staff members have closed the office in the Public Health Department and have been assigned to other areas to continue working in the disaster relief program for the Oregon and California floods. From the onset of the disaster in Klamath County, over 100 families applied to the Red Cross for some type of service or assistance. Repairs to homes authorized by the Red Cross have not been completed, as many homes in Klamath County still have water in them. Anyone having questions should contact the local Red Cross office, where staff and volunteers are available to complete the assistance planned by the disaster workers.

The meet the responsibilities Congress placed upon the organization as the official disaster relief agency of our government, trained disaster specialists from many parts of the United States were rushed to flooded areas in Oregon, California, Washington and Idaho to work alongside Red Cross chapter volunteers in meeting the needs of families and individuals. More than 35,000 persons were housed and fed in Red Cross shelters during the early days of the disaster, and $5 million is the current estimate to meet the entire disaster cost to Red Cross.

Total Estimated

Although by comparison, Klamath County was only lightly brushed by the disaster, cost of the Red Cross program in Klamath County has reached $10,000. Red Cross dollars are spent not only to meet the immediate emergency needs for food, clothing and shelter, but also for long-range, planned assistance to individuals and families—for rebuilding, repairing and refurnishing homes or to meet medical expense for disaster - caused loss and illness for which the individual has no resources.

Mrs. Nona Wiman, supervisor of the National Disaster Staff in Klamath Falls, commented that those applying for Red Cross aid proved to be those in genuine need. One hundred families applied for some type of Red Cross service or assistance and 44 applied for grants to finance long-time rehabilitation. Many families affected by the flood had their own resources and used them for recovery.

Oregonians Praised

C. Milton Jackson, district director of Red Cross Disaster Operations for Oregon, also noted the self-reliance of the native Oregonian. "One older Oregonian summed up the attitude for me," said Jackson, "by telling me, 'When a neighbor is sick or in trouble, we just take him a bucket of soup and milk his cow.'

"What we want the people of Oregon to understand," Jackson continued, "is that the American Red Cross is made up of millions of neighbors just like that. The funds available to help the people of this state came from neighborly people in all the states who can't go here to make the soup or milk the cow. Instead, they have asked us to come and provide whatever neighborly help is needed, in their name."
