Salem Publishers Favor Open Shop

SALEM, Ore., July 30.—(AP)—The Oregon Statesman, local morning newspaper, will be issued under the "open shop" or "American plan" conditions in the typographical department tomorrow morning, the management having issued a notice to that effect Saturday afternoon, in which it was joined by the Capital Journal, the afternoon newspaper, which will adopt the plan Monday.

The typographical union voted for a strike, but did not officially notify the publishers.

The Statesman had practically a full force of non-union employes at work tonight. Approximately 20 union men are idle, and this number will be swelled to 30 when the Capital Journal participates in the lockout Monday.

The strike vote was taken following the refusal of the publishers to grant a contract carrying an increase from $42 to $48 for day work, $45 to $51 for night work, and a reduction from the 44-hour week to 42 hours. Negotiations have been under way for a number of weeks since the last contract expired.
