These new men who go into the camps are to replace those who, for some reason or other have severed their connection with the camps since the last enrollment period. New men to be taken in will total about 60,000 for the entire United States. This will bring the strength of the forest camps up to 370,000 men. On November 30, the number was 345,000.

Up to the first of the month, some 75,000 persons, other than enrolled personnel, had been furnished employment in connection with the administration of the camps, the care of the men, the supervision of the work in the forests, and the construction of the camp buildings. This includes approximately 9,000 reserve officers and 25,000 technical supervisors have received employment for varying periods of time.
