Outranks Japan Two to One.

If the trip of the battleships is intended solely as a demonstration for the benefit of Japan, the showing of the United States will be most impressive. The battleship fleet will by no means be the entire naval force, but it represents the most powerful fighting engines that fly the American flag, and both in numbers and tonnage the American battleship fleet outranks the Japanese more than two to one. Such demonstration could not but make an impression, no matter what the result. But it would serve to call attention to the respective strength of the two navies in their entirety.

If the 16 battleships of the Atlantic fleet find their way to the Pacific, great pressure will be brought to bear on the administration to have some of them left It is admitted that the present Pacific fleet is woefully weak and inadequate. There is no good reason why the west coast should be discriminated against in this manner, and if Congressional influence, backed by the President, gets to work on the Navy Department. the Pacific may get some permanent benefit from the proposed cruise.

In the eyes of naval men, the ideal battleship fleet consists of eight vessels: there are therefore two fleets to make the trip to the Pacific if the programme is carried out. Regardless of what comes of the "prac tice cruise" around the Horn, the agitation is very apt to have a wholesome effect on Congress. It has demonstrated the utter weakness of our present fleet on the Pacific and the danger that the Nation runs in concentrating its naval forces on the Atlantic. The probabilities are that the next Congress will deal more liberally with the Navy than has been its custom in late years. If this results, the President will have gained another triumph, for he has long been an advocate of a greater Navy and has pelleyed from the first that at least four battleships should be authorized each year until the Navy reaches proper proportions. There is no doubt but what the Navy will be a conspicuous topic be fore the next Congress, and the Paulific
