WHAT SHALL I DO

for her services is greatest.

High Standard Set.

The work of the war nurse now is vastly different from that of the first sisters of charity. Likewise the modern war hospital in efficiency and general equipment is far ahead of the nursing barracks organized by Florence Nightingale, at the time of the Crimean war.

War nursing today naturally suggests the Red Cross, the composite of relief, comfort, education, and all the ministrations, that can be given by a closely knit, and highly systematized organization made up of thousands of of trained, capable and willing workers under competent supervision. The Red Cross is the official organization for relief recognized by the government, and it takes precedence over all others when war exists, and whenever any widespread disaster occurs. It is the hub of the nursing service in such times, and about it, revolve all other humane activities which have as their aim the alleviation of suffering.

The Red Cross is the reserve of the Army and Navy Sanitary corps, and its services are utilized alike by the Army and Navy. The war nurse, who serves under the banner of the Red Cross, is thus a recognized part of the government service. She takes a solemn and formal oath of allegiance to the country, the same oath which is specified in the army regulations, by which she swears "to support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies; to bear true faith and allegiance to the same and to faithfully discharge the duties of her office."

With the Base Hospital.

The actualities of war have quickened and strengthened and increased the nursing forces of the Red Cross, and each day the demand is becoming more pressing for trained nurses to fall into the ranks of this great humanitarian preparedness army. The establishment of Base Hospital units, which are being formed in all parts of the country in connection with leading hospitals and which represent perfectly forged links in the war nursing chain, has stimulated the enrollment of Red Cross nurses during the past year. Sixteen hundred graduate nurses have been added to the list of those who are ready at a moment's notice to drop the immediate work in hand and join their respective unit, composed of surgeons, physicians, nurses, nurses' reserves and nurses' aids, and report for emergency service under the supervision of the government.

The tasks imposed upon the war nurse are varied, and her field of service depends upon the urgency of the situation. Since the beginning of the European war the American Red Cross has sent 253 nurses to Europe to serve in English, French, Russian, German, Serbian and Belgian hospitals. These nurses were of course not required by the rules of the Red Cross to enlist for foreign service, but did so of their own accord. Theirs is the honor of being part of the greatest nursing service ever rendered by a neutral or warring countries, and their experiences which few of them would relinquish, have ben of incalculable value. The term of service for the nurse who goes to the war zone does not exceed six months' though many have through choice remained to give their services as long as the war lasts.

On the Danger Line.

The duties of the Red Cross nurse are chiefly confined to the hospital where she is stationed, and this is as far removed from the danger zone as efficiency of service will permit. She may be called upon to administer first aid and she is, of course, responsible for the care of the wounded who have been operated upon. She has a ceaseless round of bedside duties to perform, she must be able at a moment's notice to assume responsibilities which she never has to face in normal times under peace conditions, and she must have at her command every atom of her resourcefulness and self control. Her possibilities for service are unlimited. Under the new system she is director of the group of lay women who act as nurses aids and who have qualified for their work by taking a special course in elementary hygiene and home care of the sick.

There is a chance for the Red Cross nurse engaged in war nursing to get very close to the danger line and to feel the pulse of battle if she enlists as a member of the Emergency Detachment. These detachments are smaller than the Base hospital units and are intended for quick duty on hospital ships and hospital trains and to meet any emergency which requires the instant mobolization of relief workers.

Red Cross branches have been opened in all parts of the country. Twenty-five base hospital units have been established for service in the army. Fifty training schools connected with general hospitals have been asked to organize Navy detachments, and it is the belief of Clara D. Noyes, director of the Bureau of Nursing Service, that, instead of the 6,200 nurses already enrolled the Red Cross could, in the event of actual war, enlist all the nurses in the United States, who meet its requirements.

Questions on this subject addressed to Mrs. Bull, care of this paper, will be answered either in these columns or by letter.—Editor.

Husbands, Beware! Wife May Draw Bead on Bank Roll

By Margaret Mason.

Beads are going to waist this year
Yet plenty are left 'tis said
To account for the lot
That whether or not
Have gone to Milady's head.

New York, April 7.—This is the season of the belting reign. Belts certainly reign supreme as the fad of the moment and the shops and waistlines of the fair are simply flooded with them, provided of course that they are beaded. For a belt without a bead on these days is as flat as a draught of malted brew is without the same.

Some of the beaded belts are flat anyway. These are the long flat girdles elaborately and solidly beaded 17 gayly colored designs with fringed ends of beads that are worn with the loose, straight lined chemise gowns. These are suggestive of and indeed many are fashioned by Indians — South Central and our own North American tribes. Indian rope girdles of beads with beaded tasseltated ends are also popular.

For wear outside of the new loose silk coats and wraps are the Oriental and Royal girdles of metal links alternating with large beads, disks or squares of imitation jade, crysephrase and lapis lazuli or with cames, Chinese coins or jet nail heads.

The more fantastic the color combinations of these girdles, the more elaborately chased and carved the metal links, the more effective and stunning they are. Almost all of them finish with omnipresent tassel in metal or beads.

Though she struggles to be free, lovely woman still paradoxically loads herself with chains. Not content even with these beaded chain belts and girdles she further shackles herself by gayly slipping her neck into a rope of beads and metal links that ape the metal girdles on a finer scale. An artistic one of slender silver links broken here and there with balls of blue lapis added just the right touch to a charming putty toned gabardine trimmed in embroidered bits of lapis blue and putty tassels worn the other day. Really now-a-days your costume is not complete unless you wear one of the metal girdles or neck chains, earrings and finger ring whose beaded charms bring out the telling color note of your gown.

Behold, the evolution of the bead certainly makes the busy B. From bag to belt, from belt to bosom and from bosom to "bean" we have it. For now every swagger bonnet has a bit of beading on it. Some of them are beaded to beat the band with bands of beads and yet others rely solely on a single ornament of beads in front, back or side or wherever the beads will be most telling.

The ornaments rather run to animal effects and beaded bunnies, birds, felines and fishes perch rakishly abaft a bonnet. Chanticleer in gaudy beadery is a popular favorite though it isn't necessarily a cocked hat that sports this cocky design.

Beads of wood, beads of glass and beads of every known composition, color and design adorn our headgear and thus the bead craze may be said to have reached its proper level for you see whether on beer or bonnets you can't keep a good bead down.

It is odd to pause in the midst of our beads and consider how all the world has a beaded bead in common, and how all the four corners of the earth meet us on a fashionable footing or rather beading. From China we gather in a glory of beads and Indian and Turkey lay further ones at our fashionable shrine. We sport Indian beads from the three America glass and pearl beads from Italy and to account for the impetus given wooden beads in our hat ornamentation comes this story.

A village of French peasants for years had plied their wooden bead craft. When their village was shelled by the German guns the survivors fled to Paris. Here knowing nothing else save their life work of fashioning beads of wood they returned to their craft. They turned them out to be eagerly seized upon the Parisian modistes as just the novelty they yearned for. Hence as the usual reply to all our present day fads and fancies: the war, mesdames, is again the answer.
