BUCKWURAT CARRA -The Scient fic Ameri-honey; the one being deposited in cells for the sustemance of the insect, and the other hald by within as a means of defease. Now, in making this separation in the chemical laboratory of the insect (or by accident where dead bees are in the honey while being rend-red.) it often occurs that portions of this poison are mixed with the honey, producing all the disagreeable effects which would result from the use of backwheat itself. There is, perhaps, no article containing as great a per centage of the poisonous principle used for food as backwheat in its various forms; and the sameness of its aroma with that given off by the common honey bee is a proof of its identity.

All poisonous is a cts and reptiles are healthy, active and variant in proportion to the pienti-active and virulent in proportion to the p'enti-ful supply of the poison they are enabled to derive from their food; and while feeding on such articles as yield them this supply their stings or bites are more virulent than at other times. This I saw fully demonstrated last winter in transporting the homey bee over the Isthmus to California from the coal regions of the North. The sting from those bees, in the the North. The sting from those bees, in the most unleathly state, produced but little sentation or effect upon the human flish. The revous, warlike liabits of the honey-bee during the period of the flowering of buckwheat fully corroborate the doctrine that this plant contains considerable quantities of poison, and it is on this principle that its irritating qualities depend.

The best remedy to prevent the disagreeable burning and itching sensation of the skin caused by a free nee of buckwheat cakes, is carbonate of soda, (or an alkali of a similar nature,) used in their raising, or taken internally when the itching has taken place in consequence of having caten too freely of the cakes. And here let me state that an alkali of the above chemical nature, immediately of the above chemical nature, immediately taken and applied to the skin after a bite or sting of the most poisonous insect or reptile, is a good antidote, and will, in most cases save the unfortunate victim from any serious harm. Racise, Wis., Feb. 28, 1860. S. W. Jawett.
