Oregon was to us a revelation. We knew that California was bounded on the north by Oregou; we knew that Portland was situated on the Willamette; that the Willamette emptied into the Columbia; that the Columbia emptied into the sea; dividing Washington Territory from the State of Oregon. We had heard the country was rich in forests and timber; that it was of agricultural value; that fish abounded in its streams. We had a school boy's idea of its geography of coast ranges, rivers, Cascade Mountains, broad prairies and rich valleys; but we had no realizing sense of its splendid domain, and the inexhaustible fertility of soil, its expansive primeval forests; its River Willamette, more beautiful than the Sacramento, draining a valley more productive than Sacramento and San Joaquin combined. We had no idea, till we saw it, that the Columbia was the grandest and most picturesque of all the great rivers of the world; that it had scenery upon its banks in comparison with the Hudson and the Rhine sink into utter insignificance, that it and its tributaries penetrate a land which for food producing capacity has no equal on all God's five broad continents. There are more commercial buildings now in progress of erection at Portland than San Francisco. Astoria is a city of patient hopes and great expectations; located on the banks of the great river, it expectantly awaits the good time coming when it shall realize its geographical advantage and reap the harvest of an expanding commerce. For half a hundred years its owners have looked out upon the great waters of the Columbia and wondered for hali that time why the ships went sailing by to that inferior and interior town of Portland. Still they do, and Astoria sits and smiles, confident of its uled queen of the Columbia, and all its tributaries shall bring gifts and pour them into its willing lap. We would not dampen the ardor of its friends by suggesting that it is just possible that an interior railroad system may concentrate the trade of Western Oregon at Portland on the Willamette and that the trade of Eastern Oregon and Idaho may seek the shores of Puget Sound and pass out to the great ocean over that broad highway of commerce, the
