> CAPTAIN GEDGE'S ACCOUNT. The master of the steamer, Captain Gedge, says that he was on the wharf as usual collecting tickets from the oncoming passengers when the signal for departure was given. He locked the gate from wharf to gang-plank, and then walked slowly down aboard the steamer. He heard the bell from the pilot house sound for the engines to be started, and just before heading out into the stream. He was just about to ascend the stairs to reach the upper deck and go thence to curred. He says he felt a shock, and lar, and that is all he recollects. He jured, beyond the severe shock.

YOUTHFUL WISDOM IN A BLIZZARD .-It is related of two little girls of eleven and thirteen years of age that they were late in going to school, and when about half-way the storm arose and they turned back. After wandering about for a shert time they came to a strawstack. The older girl dug out the straw as far as she could. She then put her sister in ahead of her and crowded in after her. She took off their shoes, and when their feet grew cold she rubbed them briskly. The younger girl feel asleep, but the elder kept awake and continued the rubbing process when necessary: The parents gave up their children as lost, but early Friday morning, after the storm had subsided, the girls, none the worse for their experience, made their way home, and it is needless to say there was
