MAKE MARKET ON COOS BAY

shipped in from California, which cost him about one and three-quarters cents, plus freight—inferior obviously to the local produce. This choice instance we will mark "Exhibit B"—a desultory, unannounced delivery upon an already stocked market. Now then, here is the hardest nut to crack of all. By some sort of telepathic (?) understanding (maybe) the retail stores sell an article of green produce at 5c, each for which they uniformly pay 40c. per dozen "in trade" or 30c. cash. Here is an article in great demand entailing upon the retailer practically no risk, and always sold out the day received or within two days thereafter. Upon a cash basis, this is one hundred per cent profit to the dealer, who merely distributes the product, whereas, at a producing cost of between 22c. and 23c. the farmer receives about 30 per cent profit gross, with ALL the risk attached to growing, and freight or carriage to come out of that. I could cite many other examples of this latter phase of the local produce market, but the above instances will serve to show some of the drawbacks to agricultural or produce farming here on Coos Bay. Now, the above is all too sadly familiar to every farmer who plows, harrows, clod-mashes, seeds, cultivates and cultivates and CULTIVATES, digs, picks, packs, freights and delivers his produce to the distributors—the stores. In the cases of "Exhibits A and B," the farmer has only himself to blame. The merchant is conducting an organized business, whereas the farmer, through lack of organization, enjoys none of the benefits of organized business methods. He cannot blame the merchant because he, the farmer, is not a recognized and dependable source of supply. The merchant, already stocked up to the needs of his trade, takes the unorganized farmers' produce largely as an accommodation or a plain voluntary favor, and inasmuch as this act overstocks him, he, of course, discounts the price to cover his risk thus entailed. But the last instance cited is not in this category. That is an extortion pure and simple. A practice highly pernicious in its influence upon produce farming. Now for the remedy. Farmers in other sections of the country have organized upon a commercial basis, established depots for receipt and distribution of their produce, made their lands yield from $125 to $700 per acre per annum according to crop, as against from $15 to $20 per acre that they had been accustomed to realize. The organization of these farmers has in latter years assumed NATIONAL proportions, until on January 1st of this year over seven million farmers had enrolled in the Farmers' Educational and Co-Operative Union of America. An organization educational in that it teaches the farmer how to get more out of his lands per acre, and co-operative in that it points the way to the farmer's joining hands upon a strictly business basis, and becoming, through establishment of their depots, recognized and dependable sources of supply of farm products. A local instance of the benefits of farmers' organization is the co-operative creamery. It is high time that the farmers of Coos roused themselves from the agricultural somnolence which seems to pervade this region, and enroll with the Marshfield local of the National Union of which Mr. George Beale is secretary, thereby contributing the strength of numbers to this movement. Then, by energetic co-operation and steadfast fealty to the common cause, achieve results which will assist in holding up the hands of those who labor to give Coos Bay a good name and fair fame throughout the land. We will then have "made good," and will find our consciousness of having developed the latent resource made pleasant and the more satisfying by greater gains in return for our labors.
