I. I saw the young man and his blooming bride
Flee from the open doorway where their kin
And friends stood, cheering loudly, all a-grin,
And flinging rice and slippers far and wide,
With all too true an aim, one slipper shied,
Caught the fair bride upon her dimpled chin;
Another struck the groom and broke the skin—
Whereat the thrower yelled with glee and pride,
Bleeding and bruised, at last they got away,
But there were other troubles yet in store;
Their trunks, white satin ribbons did display,
And placards, crudely jocular, they bore,
At which I heard the happy bridegroom say—
Something. It's my impression that he swore.

II. I love a maiden. I have loved her long—
Devotedly. My passion does not wane;
But as the years roll on it seems to gain.
Now her attraction never was so strong.
I've not proposed. It's likely that I'm wrong.
And yet it costs me not a little pain
And not a little effort to refrain.
A life with her would be one glad, sweet song—
But when I think of those frock-coated fools
And female oafs in idiotic glee,
O'er whom the imp of apish mischief rules,
Their monkey tricks from sense or reason free,
Why, then, I have to own my ardor cools,
And I exclaim, "No wedding bells for me!" —Selected.

NOT ONE WOMAN in twenty marries the man whom at the age of 18 she feels she could die for. It is a fortunate thing that ideals change, otherwise many couples would be sadly mismatched, writes Beatrice Fairfax, who gives the following advice:
We are easily pleased at 18; a handsome face and figure and good clothes go a long way toward the making of our ideal.
At 25, something more than good looks is required.
I know one woman who, had she married her ideal at 18, would have been, by now, a most thoroughly unhappy woman.
As it is, she has been for several years blissfully happy as the wife of a man whom, at 18, she would have scorned. She would have thought him not half stylish enough, being too young to see the real man under the simple manner and somewhat dowdy clothes.
I wish girls would learn to appreciate how unimportant the cut of a man's coat is.
It is of the utmost importance that his linen be immaculate, but a "stylish" man is an abomination. It is bad enough for a woman to spend most of her time thinking about dress, but for a man to do so is dreadful.
The girl over 20 demands, first of all, that a man be manly.
If his face is honest and healthy, she does not care whether he is handsome or plain.
The best looking man I know would not appeal to a girl of 18. She would not understand the wonderful strength of his face.
Look for a man you won't grow tired of, girls—a man who will hold you by his strength of character, one who won't let you grow tired of him.
If you are but 18, and feel that you have found your ideal, be very sure of yourself before you marry him. Use your head as well as your heart; try to look ahead; try to imagine him 10 years from now.

Marriage, you know, is the most important thing in life, the best and most natural life for all men and women.

Every woman has the chance to marry, even if she never has a proposal. By that I mean that no woman goes through life without some man loving her and wishing to marry her.

If he never reaches the proposing point it is the woman's fault, not his. Don't mar your chance of happy married life by taking the wrong man.

Marry a man who has not stopped growing yet, one who is developing his brain every day.

If you marry a man whose mind is all on clothes and style and sport, he won't have much time to spend on you.

Also remember that the man with a very handsome face is often exceedingly vain, a fact for which he can thank all the foolish little girls who have laid their hearts at his feet.

It is far more important that he be a man's man than a ladies' man. When other men like a man, it means that he is "square."

Women may not like him, because he is not very good looking, nor very ready with compliments.

But that need not concern you. If you like him and he likes you, no one else need count.

If you were buying a house that you expected to occupy all the rest of your life, you would spend endless thought and care on the selection, wouldn't you?

Can you afford to spend less care on the selection of a life partner?

Mr. and Mrs. Ray of Cooston invited a few friends to spend Sunday with them and enjoy a birthday dinner to be given in honor of their daughter, Miss Edna Ray. A most delicious strawberry dinner was spread in the open air among the cherry trees in the orchard. The afternoon was enjoyed in the form of an outing, the young folks exploring the surrounding country. All enjoyed a splendid time and expressed their regrets that Edna's birthday could not come oftener, but console themselves by knowing that it came at the right time of the year anyway. Among those invited who were present were: Mrs. Coleman, May Lamm, Myrtle Downer, Helen McLoughlin, Zetta Mitchell, Mr. Coleman, Messrs. Eltin Metlin, Charley Lamm, Shannon Mitchell, Otto G... and John W. Motley.

Mrs. W. S. Chandler of San Francisco, is now visiting friends and relatives in Portland and other northern points. She and the family expected here about July 4 to spend the summer at their South River bungalow.
