The latest Shanghai tale is that Li Hung Chang, who has died so many times in the past few weeks, is to be made Chinese foreign minister to fulfill the functions of the defunct Tsung Li Yamun. Next!

A kingship is not what it used to be. The unhappy kaiser complains that his ministers are protesting against Russian aggressions in the Orient contrary to his wishes. Only a day or two previously he announced his plans for defending his person against an infuriated populace.

Japan has finally decided that there can be no peace in the Orient until Russia receives a much-needed drubbing and hence proposes to administer the medicine herself if the other powers are unwilling. If Japan attempts to carry out the idea she is quite likely to find the drubbing on the other side. Whipping decrepit old China and the increasingly powerful Russian empire are two quite different propositions.

RUSSIAN AGGRESSION GETS A SETBACK.

Brooklyn Standard Union.
China's rejection of the Manchurian treaty proposed by Russia is the most encouraging sign from the Orient we have had in many a day, especially when accompanied by the official announcement that the Tien Tsin crisis is over, England and Russia having agreed to withdraw their troops from the disputed territory, pending a diplomatic inquiry into the proprietary rights of the respective governments.
China naturally would never give up Manchuria voluntarily, and the fact that she has rejected Russia's arbitrary terms raises the presumption that the Imperial government has been assured of powerful support in case of an open conflict with the Muscovites. The professional assistance it is safe to assume comes from Japan and Great Britain, the interests of both nations being gravely threatened by Russia's ascendancy in the Celestial empire; but possibly Germany, whose trade would be just as much hurt by the practical closure of Chinese ports as that of other nations, may also have secretly promised aid in certain eventualities, and if so Russia could not possibly face such a tremendous combination. That a check of some kind has at least temporarily been put upon Muscovite designs is certain, as the trace agreed upon at Tien Tsin proves, for the big Bear never yields a point except upon compulsion.

The defeat of Russian aggression in China would be a blessing to the whole world. The czar's government, which is a combination of military, aristocratic and clerical despotism, blights everything it touches; it is a semi-barbaric, annihilates individualism, retards civilization and hampers trade; even Chinese civilization is scarcely inferior to it; and no true American can honestly and intelligently favor it for a moment. From a mere monetary standpoint our interests would suffer from Russian domination in Manchuria. For the door of commerce would be shut in our faces the moment the bear got undisputed control. The United States stands with Great Britain and all civilized governments for the "open door" in China, and although it is not our policy to go to war or to be dragged into entangling alliances, whatever our government can accomplish by diplomacy to keep the Eastern ports open will doubtless be done. The United States is on record as protesting vigorously against the partition of China, against vindictive and unnecessary punishments and against demands for excessive indemnities, which the Celestials could not possibly pay, and which would probably be made a pretext for the permanent occupation of Chinese territory. Russia has notoriously been playing a double game throughout this Eastern crisis, pretending to be opposed to the partition of China, while seizing a large slice of it, and making impossible by secret intrigues the speedy conclusion of peace, apparently with the design of profiting further by divisions among the powers and by England's difficulty in South Africa.

Even if Russia should succeed in acquiring certain territorial advantages, it is not likely she would be allowed to retain them very long. The spirit of the age is against her. The forces of progress, of civilization and of regulated liberty are too strong in this twentieth century to be defeated by a reactionary power like Russia, no matter how strong materially she may be.
