NEWSPAPER THOUGHTS OF THE WEEK.

Should the rumor prove true that Ex-Senator Pettigrew has been appointed president of the Great Northern, there will be one less calamity-howling, socialist crank in the country. A sure cure for Pettigrew's peculiar form of paternalistic crankiness is to put him in the way to get rich. President Pettigrew would in no time become a sedate, sober, conservative citizen.

This is taken from a republican paper, The Dallas Chronicle. Now, Senator Pettigrew is concededly an able fellow, courageous, and one who has seen some dangerous tendencies in modern republican policies. He has told the country some very plain truths. In the United States senate he was strong enough to warrant Senator Hanna in making a special campaign in South Dakota, Pettigrew's home state. He was the particularly sharp thorn in the side of the administration.

Now we will suppose that Pettigrew has actually accumulated $250,000 in Wall street speculations; that he is to be president of the Great Northern railway company. The republican paper to which reference is made assumes at once, that, if these things be true, Pettigrew will no longer have a voice to warn the people of what every good citizen knows is danger; that he will be seduced by the possession of wealth into acquiescence in a program prepared by men of immense financial holdings and who are in very fact the power behind the present administration.

The Chronicle could not have selected a episode more accurately illustrative of the tendency in modern times of men of wealth to support the selfish financial giants of the East, who, caring not for the common people, plan all sorts of combinations to obtain control of the production and transportation interests, and to reduce the people to a position of virtual slavery.

If Senator Pettigrew be made president of the Great Northern, it is more than likely that he will be placed there for the sole purpose of bribing him to cease his course of conscientious opposition to measures and tendencies that are causing thoughtful men to tremble for the future of the republic.

Says the Portland Telegram: It is very tasteless satire to which Mr. W. J. Bryan resorts in his paper, in assuming that the favorable impression made upon the Cuban delegates lately in Washington was due to the social entertainment accorded them. They are not quite so cheap men as that, neither are the officials at Washington so shallow as to have supposed that the Cubans could be caught with that sort of chaff. Mr. Bryan seems to have soured and narrowed with his last defeat, so that he cannot get a proper perspective on anything political.

Who that has read history does not know that, since kings began to organize courts and train diplomats, the social influence has been potent in accomplishing things when argument and threat availed nothing? Make a man your guest, treat him with lavish hospitality, and you place him in a position of obligation such as few men have a moral courage to subject to the considerations of state. It would have been more seemly had those Cuban delegates politely declined invitations to elaborate social functions, made their call on the president and the secretary of war, and returned home uninfluenced by the flattery and, perhaps, by the veiled but seductive promises made them by the administration of favor in future in case they yielded to the administration's wishes. That their reception and entertainment influenced them is by no means improbable. No man is so strong that he would not to some extent be thus affected.

This is how it appears to the Eugene Guard, that episode of the arrest of Brauer for taking money from a gambling table at which he had lost:

A Pendleton justice of the peace is entitled to a leather medal, and the whole hide is none too large. A man had played off several dollars against an open gambling game when he took snap judgment by reaching into the money tray for a handful of silver. The gambler had no little sense as to advertise their unlawful business by having the man arrested. And the justice of the peace bound him over to await the action of the grand jury on the charge of larceny from a store. "Larceny from a store" when the evidence showed it was a gambling game!

The Tacoma News gets in a solar plexus blow on San Francisco, in the following neat paragraph:

The Hearst newspapers are sending three newsboys around the world by different routes on a race against time. One from the Chicago American goes eastwardly and sails from New York for Europe today. The New York Journal and the San Francisco Examiner send their representatives westwardly. But it is a fact worth mentioning that both of these lads come to Puget Sound to take the northern route across the Pacific to Japan. They are to sail by the Empress of India on Saturday of this week. After crossing the Pacific they will take different routes across the Eastern hemisphere. This is a significant admission by a San Francisco newspaper that Puget Sound is the natural American terminal for trans-Pacific trade and travel.

And thus does the Oregonian grimly and defiantly reply to the many newspaper strictures on its editorial anent the sickness of Mrs. McKinley:

The Oregonian is a plain speaker. It is no admirer of mincing manner or pretentious style. It hopes it never may be. Everybody knows and every candid person admits that it was ill-advised on the part of the president to attempt a long and fatiguing journey of a public nature with his invalid wife. The Oregonian, as a plain speaker, has plainly said a thing that is in every one's mind. But it brings remonstrance and denunciation from certain little-minded people of the press, who attribute the Oregonian's remark to an alleged "hatred of President McKinley." Of course, this is an assumption utterly gratuitous and without foundation. The Oregonian finds better business than indulging hatred of anybody. But it is a plain speaker. It does not admit that there are sacred and forbidden subjects, pertaining to thinking and living, to topics of general concern, secular or religious, with which it may not meddle. The Oregonian is one of those journals which would lose their main function, should they renounce their habit of plain speech.

HE SMOKED A MILLION.

The man who smoked up $1,000,000 is dying at his home in Columbus, says the Chicago American. Colonel W. T. Baron, who gained distinction as a confederate leader, and later became notorious because of the fact that his path through life was strewn with money which he threw away, is now in almost actual want. He is suffering from a fatal disease, and his physicians say that he will never leave his bed alive.

Many years ago Colonel Baron became widely known in financial circles all over the country because of his brilliant career. Where other men refused to risk a penny Colonel Baron threw in his whole fortune and won. Time after time he identified himself with wild and visionary schemes which seemed almost fatal to his wealth, and each time, as if by some strange freak of fortune, the investment brought a golden flow to the coffers of the reckless investor.

The Baron fortune grew until it became enormous. Then Colonel Baron's son went out on the railroad track one day and was cut to pieces by a train. The colonel's every hope was in the boy, of whom he was passionately fond. He had said that he was building up a fortune for him to manage. When he saw his boy's lifeless body he was rendered suddenly insane.

He became possessed of a mania for getting rid of his money, in which endeavor he was as successful as in building it up. At the time of his son's death he was reputed to be worth $5,000,000. In five years he was penniless.

One of Colonel Baron's peculiarities was a desire to burn his money. It was his invariable habit to purchase a single cigar at a time, for which he always paid $1. He would then step to the cigar lighter and take a bill of large denomination from his pocket. He would light this at the cigar lighter and then light his cigar from the burning bill.

He never used small bills. In fact, he seldom carried them, and was supposed to silver money that he tossed his coins upon the street if they came to him in change. He rarely accepted change from a bill.

His friends did all in their power to prevent Baron from continuing in his madness, but to no avail. Frequent applications were made to the probate court to have a guardian appointed for Colonel Baron, but he was always able at such times to prove that he was perfectly rational. Aside from his mania for getting rid of his wealth, he appeared entirely sane.

Tom G. Baron, a son of Colonel Baron, and formerly inspector of police at Columbus, says that his father ran through $5,000,000 by literally burning it up and throwing it away. At least $1,000,000 of this amount went to light cigars, he said. Tom remembers when his father was followed about the streets of Pittsburgh and New York by a small army of men and boys, who picked up strays of bills and coins which Colonel Baron left behind him. Tom has seen hundreds of dollars go up in smoke in a second. Certified checks, notes and securities were also burned.

A few years ago Colonel Baron found himself without a dollar bill and without credit. He could no longer continue on his mad career, and he settled quietly at home and since then has seldom moved away from his home. For years he has been perfectly sane and has lived frugally. When he saw his last bank note go up in a flash he seemed entirely contented to live modestly and quietly.—Chicago American.
