TEMPTED.

We stood together alone,
'Neath the dack'ning summer, sky;'
The myriads of soft stars shone,
The breeze stred t e leaves, whilst I
Stood silent, caim and still, by her side,
Kacked with the possions I strove to hide.

My love for the girl weesuch,
I had rather than lose her—dfe!
She could theill my seal by her touch,
Or a glanch from her deep dark eye.
I She sald she would trust to my words, and I
Could not tell the sweet child a lie.

There stole across me the scent
Of the fragrant illas flower—
Even flow tits to me still blent
With the agony of that hone.
There were none to hear but the stars and wind,
Yet I could not tell her I had not signed.

"Don't be so angry pray."

She whispered beseechingly,
"I only want you to say
But two or three words fo me;
That this horrible tale is false—must be,
Yet look in my eyes, and tell it ma."

But a word—but a breath—and she
To-merrow would-be my wife.
The struggle seemed shattering ma
Like a strife for Death er Life.
I felt cold and white; by me looks she knew.
Or my silence, that all she had heard was true!

"Tell me truth!" she said:
But her voice scensed calder now,
And I thought of a time long sped Before shame was on my brow.

My headlong passions and deeds I ourst,

And then I resolved she should know the warst.

In three wores I confessed;
"I am guilty!" was all I said.
Then—was I mail 4—on my breast
Rested that fair young head.
arms were around her, and I heard
s coming quickly between each work

"Dearest I feared you might
Have shrank when I tempted you—
That to seeths me down for to-night
You would tell me what was not true; Then my heart must have bent to my mind and will— Now I'm thine, love, through good and ill i.
