The White and Red Terror.

It has been announced that the coronation of the Czar has been postponed for a year because of information of Nihilist plots. These plots, of course, mean a project of massacre of the imperial family and their guests, and nothing could reveal more plainly the gloomy situation in Russia. That gloom is the characteristic aspect of Russian affairs. A kind of night rests upon the empire. Nobody feels that he is well informed of actual events, and a mutual terror of the government, on the one hand, and of the Nihilists, upon the other, envelopes the land. In this situation an article upon the Russian revolutionary party by Prince Kropotkin, one of that party, in the current number of the Fortnightly Review, is of singular interest and importance. The author was himself "for several years a public official, naively believing in the good intentions of his government," and he is evidently entirely familiar with the subject.

The general statement of Prince Kropotkin is that the despotism is so absolute that no legal and normal protest, remonstrance, argument, or movement of modification or reform is practicable. From 1861 to 1870, every form of lawful effort for relief was tried, and was utterly abortive. From the moment that Alexander II. surrounded wholly to the reactionary party, the country has been mined with secret societies. The press is gagged. There is no public opinion. The system of education is designed to perpetuate and deep ignorance, and the mass of the people long lay inert under the suffocating weight of despotic supremacy. The reform movement began by the attempt to fuse the intelligent leaders and the indifferent multitude, and this work was done, the Prince says, with a heroic self-sacrifice unparalleled in history. During all this time the life of the Czar was as secure as that of any man, and the societies themselves prevented attempts upon it. But to maintain its hold upon the Emperor the reactionary party kept him in constant alarm, and the reaction harassed the opposition with incessant prosecution and punishments. Every act and word of the popular party was distorted and maligned. The noted case of the Vera Zassoulitch was simply that of a woman who fired at the chief of the St. Petersburg police in order that, upon her trial, the infamies of the treatment of prisoners might be revealed. She said that she was glad he was not killed, as she did not desire his death, but there was no other way to unveil the system. She was acquitted, says the Prince, by public opinion. But she would have been seized by the government at the very door of the court if the people had not rescued her.

Since that time the Russian revolutionists have taken to defending themselves. No man was safe against spies, and they said: "In other countries men have courage enough to defend themselves. An Englishman or American would not permit such proceedings, and why should we? Let us have at least as much courage as this. Of course we shall sacrifice ourselves; but we will try to make such misdeeds impossible." Yet until 1879, he says, the person of the Czar remained inviolable. It was only when the "White Terror" was established that the idea of attacking absolutism in the person of the Czar became popular in the revolutionary party. But the party is not a mere conspiracy for massacre. It has distinct and declared purposes, and the Czar would be as safe tomorrow as any man in the world if he would consent to call an assembly freely elected by the people to revise the fundamental laws, and grant an amnesty for the past. What such an assembly would be, and whether a Russian Czar could consent to the overthrow of imperial rule without assassination by the hand of the imperial party, are vital questions which the prince does not consider. But his paper throws a lurid light upon the appalling situation in Russia, while the postponement of the Czar's coronation shows that the Black and Red terror is as definitely established as the White.

Novel Preservatives.

The increased demand for meats has made active inquiry in reference to transmission, the problem being how to get fresh meats a long distance from the source of supply. A new compound, prepared by Barff, styled "boro-glyceride" is claimed to produce the most satisfactory results; he steeps the fresh meat in this solution, and gives a series of experiments to demonstrate its value.

"A pair of ribs of mutton was sent last August from the Falkland Islands and the meat remained sweet and tender, and was eaten both roasted and boiled; oysters kept for three months which could not be distinguished from fresh ones, others sent raw from Jamaica to England, which retained a perfect flavor; turtles and pigeons from the same place with satisfactory results; pigeons and beef kept several months and made into a pie, with eggs laid six months."

But a still further method is now in progress of experiment in England. Instead of steeping the meat in an antiseptic, the preservative compound is introduced into the veins of the living animal, and from them into every part of the body. The sheep upon which the experiment was performed was first stunned by a blow on the head given with a wooden mallet. The left jugular vein was then laid bare, a pint of blood drawn off and about two pints of the preservative, dissolved in warm water and kept at blood heat, was injected into the opened vein. The sheep was then killed in the ordinary way, the whole occupation not occupying more than four minutes. The antiseptic used in this experiment was lactic acid, which did not in the slightest degree affect the quality or flavor of the meat, while the results of later experiments show that meat so treated will keep perfectly good without the use of ice or refrigerator for five or six weeks in summer and two or three months in cold weather.

If these methods are successful they will supersede the more costly and unsatisfactory system now in vogue.
