SCHOOL AND COMMUNITY

IT IS BECOMING more generally recognized that school conditions depend upon both general economic conditions. Committees that are poor financially or those of low moral standing may maintain good schools, but as a rule they do not. Rural school improvement is a part of general rural life improvement and comes or fails to come with rural forward movement along all lines.

This forward movement is coming most rapidly where country communities are organized for the betterment of themselves and the conditions under which they are living. It would seem that such organization is imperative.

The individualistic life of the farmer of two generations ago no longer exists. The self-sufficing farm of former days remains only in very remote and sparsely settled regions. The farm of today is a commercial institution on which the energies of the farmer are given to one or two special products. These are sold, not consumed by the family, and the money obtained is used to satisfy the family's needs.

The farmer has become a part of the community, and his individual progress depends upon the community progress. Formerly he was not a part of any community; later a part in educational and religious affairs only; now he is a part of a community in commercial affairs as well, and his progress in commercial affairs demands that he unite his interests with those of other people in the community, both farmers and tradesmen.

It is not enough that the rural population realize that they are a part of a community. They must appreciate that if progress in economic, social and educational affairs, is to take place, the communities must organize. Progress follows continued stimulation, and interest will be continued only when it is the business of some one or some group to keep up the interest.

A LITTLE SPORTING GOSSIP

By Hal Sheridan

United Press Service. NEW YORK, Jan. 8.—Golf enthusiasm in the United States has gained very rapidly for some years, but owing to weather conditions in the northern states, it has been only a three season sport. The indomitable spirit of the golfer however has overcome even bad weather conditions and for the first time several of the clubs will hold winter tournaments in the territory around New York.

The first of the winter tournaments was staged on the course of the Lakewood Country Club. Most of the players turned in low scores and all of them vowed that their game was just as good during the cold weather as during the summer. The only drawback is the roughness of the greens. It slows up, the putting considerably, but this disadvantage is overbalanced by long drives and snappy approaches.

A feature that has aroused interest in winter golf was the tournament held on the roof of the Astor Hotel recently. The fans who had put their clubs up for the winter, thinking it was too cold to play, have had a revival of interest after seeing a number of experts using their clubs on the glass enclosed roof. The roof tournament was a play for form and was attended by many social leaders. Golf in the southern states will have the benefit of the two prominent professionals, who have started a

What Soldiers Eat

U. S. Newspaperman Looks Into Allies' Larder

In France there are some twenty revictualing stations out of harm's way back of the line. Then there is what is called a "condol," which bureau unifies the thing and prevents too much of any material going to one station, and too little to another.

Long before the war was declared ways has his fresh beef, mutton or other meat; his coffee made from the coffee bean; his fresh bread and the rest. Furthermore, these things are quite good.

I have lived a few days with the private soldier and have eaten their food, so can give personal testimonial as to its excellence. I have eaten their reserve food also, their canned meats, ("monkey-meat," the soldiers call it) and tackled their hard tack; drank their cube coffee and partaken of the bullion made of their soup cubes.

It is all wholesome and nutritious. The brandy is good and stimulating and, administered in medicine doses, as the good Marianne of France administers it, and cannot harm the brave fellows standing in trenches, which are hot and cold at one and the same time. Some of this brandy is of the "calvados" brand and is made of fine, luscious apples, and in slipping it, the smell and taste of the apple are quite noticeable.

The revictualing of the Allies, under ordinary circumstances, is carried on by England and France separately. That is France feeds her own troops and England does likewise. It rarely happens—though the circumstance is not unknown—that the French have to feed the English or vice versa.

The English eat more tinned foods than the French, one reason being their means of transport are more difficult. They also consume tea in enormous quantities whereas the French are little addicted to the use of tea.

Were the war to stop at this moment, my mental picture of the British soldier would be a healthy looking individual standing by the side of a newly opened packing case eating roast beef from a tin. I have seen him at numerous points along the line and it seems to me he is always eating.

The Frenchman has two meals a day plus his morning coffee. The two big meals are at, or around 11 o'clock in the morning and 5:30 or 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Usually his meat and vegetables are served together, as they are cooked, the mixture being a stew prepared in huge pots or boilers.

His ration is served him by the cook who ladles out a piece of meat and the regulation amount of rice, beans or peas, in his "gamelle" or casserole, which is part of his equipment.

the war department had tabulated the average output of food stuffs in each department of France. It was already understood that, in case of war, each department was to furnish so much of this or that article. The thing works out automatically. Now that it is started, the government paying the departments for everything as it is bought. The departments send to prearranged destinations, otherwise to a certain one of the score of revictualing stations. Coffee, tea, part of her flour, and so on, France buys abroad and the revictualing stations are supplied from central warehouses in the various ports.

The flour goes first to the station warehouse, upon its arrival. From there it is taken to a "standardizing" room above the mixing pans. In this room, flours from the United States, South America, Canada, Russia, France and elsewhere, are mixed, or blended so that the quality will always be the same. I have the word of the soldiers themselves that they get all they want to eat and that they get it "good."
