THEIR PHONY ARGUMENT

THERE are those who say that action by congress for taking over the administration of the grant lands would cause further and prolonged litigation, with an effect of preventing early settlement and of depriving the counties of taxes for a long time to come.

It is a cunning argument. It helps the cause of the railroad in its effort to influence congress in legislation respecting the grant lands. It is an argument that influences some honest people who sincerely hope to see the agricultural land broken up and occupied by expatriating settlers at an early date. The cry is an attempt to deceive. There is no real danger of extended litigation so jauntily predicted. The supreme court has positively declared that the railroad's interest in the grant lands is no more than $2.50 per acre. Since the court will not reverse itself, nobody knows better than does the corporation that it is hopeless to attempt litigation to give it more than a $2.50 ownership in the lands. Nobody knows better than does the corporation that all its interest beyond $2.50 per acre to the grant is irretrievably lost.

Nor could the railroads afford to tie up the lands in litigation for any great length of time. The accumulating taxes and other fixed charges are too heavy to permit the company to thus hold the lands in the courts for a long period. Furthermore, congress could, and doubtless would, be entirely willing to make special provision in whatever law is passed for an early hearing on any further legal questions. It has even been suggested that congress could give the federal supreme court original jurisdiction to try any further cases that might arise as a result of possible new legislation, and that such cases could be directed to be advanced on the court's calendar.

In any event, there would be no necessity for protracted litigation. Only questions of law could now be raised, for all the facts have been tried out. With $40,000,000 worth of timber and agricultural lands in Oregon as the state, the presentation of all kinds of phony arguments, confusing statements and bewildering issues may be looked for. It is when the public becomes confused that it gets plucked. It was in the period when there was no dependable newspaper to warn the public of what was going on that the tide lands were lost, the school lands gobbled, the swamp lands sequestered and the other rights of the people in the public domain stolen.—Portland Journal.
