at the MOVIE THEATRES

For novel openings the Triangle picture, "The Habit of Happiness," could scarcely be excelled.

The first flash on the screen shows a bed, with three heads on the pillows. In the center is the face of Douglas Fairbanks. On either side of his countenance there is a collection of whiskers, dirt, wrinkles and other unattractive material which in some degree may be said to suggest the physiognomy of a human being.

Fairbanks, awaking, looks to one side of him, and then to the other. At first he is inclined to think himself the victim of a waking nightmare but on looking about the room he discovers that what confronts him is not a vision, but grimy reality. Scattered over the floor, sprawled in easy chairs, propped against the wall are some dozen specimens of the human derelict known by the name of bum.

And such bums! The Bowery was searched for "types," and the resulting collection is remarkable both for variety and picturesqueness. The scenes in which the derelicts take part are technically comedy, but to any spectator who looks at the picture with his heart as well as his eyes, there is a good deal more than comedy in the worn, weary hopeless faces. At the Temple tonight.

Clara Kimball Young and Her Own Company will appear at the Star Theatre tonight in her latest Select Star Series production "The Reason Why," by Elinor Glyn, adapted by Mary Murillo and directed by Robert G. Vignola.
Miss Young enacts the role of Yvonne Marinoff, "a woman born to obey the supreme law of womanhood; to love once completely, giving her all"; she is the wife of the most hated man in Russia, Nicholas Marinoff, prefect of police. Disappointed in her quest for love and crushed by the ruthless brutality of her husband, her only consolation is their boy Mimo, seven years old. From her window she watches Marinoff, escorted by two mounted policemen, break up a throng listening to a revolutionist's harangue. With a blow of his whip, Marinoff kills the young son of the speaker, incensed by this act, the mob lynches the prefect and rushes on to his house to revenge the murder of the boy on the late murderer's own son. Yvonne sees the approaching mob and escapes thru a rear window with Mimo.

That night the fleeing Yvonne comes upon a dead woman, as like her as a twin sister; on the body is a letter addressed to Zara, in which the writer, her uncle Francis Mark, asks her to come to England where he will welcome her with open arms. Yvonne sees in a flash that here is her opportunity to escape.
