How did all America get so fond of Salmon?

People of the Northwest have known the appetizing goodness of salmon for years. Since the 1800's local fishermen have been supplying them with this delicacy.

But farmers in Kansas . . . ranchers in Arizona . . . inland city dwellers . . . had never tasted it until some fifty years ago. How did these people, and all America, get so fond of salmon?

The answer is the tin can. For, since 1901 American Can Company has been cooperating with commercial fisheries in this region, constantly widening the market for Pacific Coast and Alaskan salmon.

Since increasing amounts of this area's fish, fruits, vegetables and other foods have become available in convenient containers, the diet of people all over the world has been improved. And new income for the Northwest has been created.

This is another illustration of how a progressive organization, in developing new and much needed products, performs a public service.
