CIRCUS RIDER'S SCHOOL.

There is the usual circus ring in the center of the barn like building. On two or three sides of the ring are rows of marrow box stalls, in which the trained boxes have their hones. A score or more of hosters and helpers are about the ream, making and keeping things clean and next. With the cold blast that comes in at the open door comes also a tall, rather slim, figure, wrapped in a cloak of fur, and with such a har and such gloves, and such an outfit generally as one might expect to see on any lady taking her morning walk on Broadway. She is decidedly prefty as she trips in, closes the door, ng," and then trips up a flight of stairs to her dressing room. But before the disappears from sight the says: "Planse get Bob ready."

Box is brought out. He is a big horse, more white than gray, and is taken from one of the stalls which have a number very like him in color in them. That prompts an in-quantive visitor to ask one of the titled people standing round if white horses are the ly ones that will train well for circus pur
