Harvey Smith's "Too Good" Money

The Oregonian of July 22 has an editorial, "Too Good Money to Good"

The Oregonian argues consistently and correctly that the only way to make money more plentiful is to increase the money supply

The Oregonian argues that to attempt to do this would place our country upon a silver basis

For a McKinley tariff paper, the Oregonian makes a remarkable admission

The error lies in believing that a dollar cannot be too good

Why not pay as you go? Salem has built a city hall on credit

The city of St. Francis has just completed a building for its purposes at a cost of seven million dollars

Those dollars he must use to pay interest and principal on mortgages

The purchasing power of the dollar has been increased until his debt is practically doubled

Now let us take the condition of the laborer. The Oregonian says, the gold money dollar is not too good for a laborer

Harvey Smith concludes with the customary gold standard fallacy

Is he interested in a dollar that will buy a great deal of the only thing he has to sell?

He has nothing to sell but his labor

He is interested in a dollar that will buy a great deal of the only thing he has to sell

He has nothing to sell but his labor

Let us take the example of a printer's office where the wages paid the laborer are just about one-half what they were twenty years ago

What has been demoralized? Not silver alone, but labor and products

Mr. Bryan by his non-sensitible logic, says here the fallacy of the gold standard

The Republican who sincerely demands international free trade

Mr. Scott, who is for gold standard only, is consistent in opposing even international free trade
