JOURNAL X-RAYS.
England leaves the world a Christmas gift of a possible European war.

Salem has among her merchants some of the highest advertisers in Oregon.

England will be a Republic before South Africa is all reduced to colonies.

One blessed result will come from the Transvaal—the abolition of the House of Lords.

Look out for the Hollanders: When they get through praying they will soon begin to shoot.

The average jury are more likely to hang themselves than to hang any one else on circumstantial evidence.

Buller still has his tog of war before him. He has not crossed the Tugela. Too many bullets ahead of Buller.

The pushing JOURNAL advertisers are all doing a good holiday trade. They do their pushing before the holiday trade is all over.

The extra profits of one good day will often pay a month's advertising expense. It is no wonder Salem merchants are in creasing their advertising.

The JOURNAL Christmas story may grate on some people's sensibilities, but, like the rest of THE JOURNAL, it will not be hackneyed or on a thread-bare topic.

Roseburg Review: England is feeling the scarcity of money, and a 7 per cent bank rate is talked of. The Bank of England needs more cash, and it is barely possible that Russia may be asked for relief. The Czar may give up $5,000,000 in gold in return for assist-

EMPIRE AT STAKE

England Took Enormous Chances in the Transvaal War.

Editorial in Seattle Post-Intelligencer—Pro-British.

At last Great Britain understands that she must put forth her full strength against the South African uprising. The appointment of Lord Roberts as commander-in-chief, the calling out of the entire military reserve and the dispatch of another division to the seat of war raise this conflict to the rank of the greatest in which England has ever been involved. They are an announcement to the world of the seriousness of the situation, and a pledge of the tremendous issues involved in the event.

It has come to this: that the integrity of the British empire itself is at stake. At the outset, it would have cost little more to concede the Boer demands and retire from the borders of the Transvaal than it cost Mr. Gladstone to follow the same course in 1881. It is different now. It is a question not only of territory, but of prestige. And in the prestige status of England's affairs and of feeling among the patrons of Europe, prestige means empire.

The first danger is the loss not merely of suzerainty over the Transvaal, but of all South Africa. For a long time there has been a sentiment growing among the Dutch colonists in favor of a confederation of their own. The South African movement is obscure, but it is real. If the Boers are not crushed, losses retrieved, authority re-established and extended, Natal and Free State and Rhodesia and Cape Colony itself will be swept into the stream. Their unexpected victories have filled the South African with a belief that their dream may become a practical reality. British sovereignty is trembling today in every portion of South Africa.

A graver danger, perhaps, looks from the East across the ocean that leads to India. British authority there rests still upon the popular conviction that her might is irresistible. The terrible lesson of the mutiny has not been forgotten. But neither have Indian people lost the tinct of their peculiar blood. Secretive, brooding, changeless, they hold the Briton still an alien and an enemy. If England were overwhelmed and driven out of South Africa, there would be sleepless nights in India, where a whisper, running mysteriously through the slumbering millions, might wake them to ambitions and deeds not yet forgotten. It is a question of empire in India.

The events of the last few weeks have exhibited the temper and disposition of Europe, as invisible handwriting appears before the fire. Great Britain has enemies only upon the continent. Between her and France there is the ancient blood-feud. Germany breaks into insolent joy at the first moment of her repulse. All of them have waited their opportunity. All of them hope and most of them say frankly that it is here. France would avenge the Fashoda affair with her check in Africa. Germany would be paramount in Africa and wrest from England her commercial interests in China. Russia would pour over the Indian borders and make all Asia her own. It is the terror of English arms that prevented any alliance in the past; the memory of the Crimea, of Waterloo, of all the glorious, bloody fields of France. England's possessions would be no safer than China's if she were proved a weakling. It is a question of empire in Europe.

The boundaries of the war with that little handful of Dutchmen, cooped in their inland state, have thus expanded until their portals fill the world's horizon. Now as of old it is the weakest that goes to the wall. No man believes that England's strength is waning. But all over the globe men's minds are busy with the suggestion, "If it should be." A mighty, history-making, earth-rendering "if"! It behooves her now to gather herself for one terrific blow, to restore injured prestige, to tell the nations that her strength is not departed or her glory dimmed. The sympathy of America is with her. Many have not believed this war a righteous one. Many have been not unwilling that she should suffer chastisement through it. But looking now at the momentous issues involved, seeing larger, darker, more dangerous figures than the Boer looming behind and thrusting him aside, the people of this country would hold for England, as she so lately held for us, against a misfit and unfriendly world.

ARBITRATION.

The Civilized Christian Nations Should Unite to Stop War.

Leonard C. Vanopden, member of the Universal Netherlands Union, has arrived in New York city on the Statenland with the appeal of the union to the nations represented at the peace conference at The Hague asking England to submit the South African question to arbitration and end the war in the Transvaal. Signatures to this appeal are being obtained in Continental countries and the appeal will be circulated in America.

"By England's threatening attitude," reads the appeal, this war has been forced on the Boers, for England desired the war. Shall civilization, of which the Occident is so proud, endure the outrage that a civilized nation is forced by another and a mightier one—only because it stands in the way of the latter—to choose between submission and extermination? All men of good will in the civilized world, of every nation and party, must unite in a public expression of their convictions.

"From the England that is under the influence of Rhodes and his gold they must appeal to the England where the spirit of Gladstone yet lives in reverent memory; from the England of brotherly love they must ask judgment against the England of the gold market. They must ask for the application of the principles of arbitration to which also England during the course of this century, has repeatedly paid homage. They must try to bring to fulfillment the expectations raised by the peace conference."

Mr. Van Noppen says the feeling in Holland and France is strong against England. He is working with several committees and societies in America to spread the appeal.

By Associated Press to the Journal. WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 21.—The call for the next national Republican convention was issued tonight. The call states that the convention will assemble in Philadelphia on Tuesday, June 19, and says:
