ANDERSON: Tempting fate with an empty tank

"Roger," there he was making a wide swing around me, radioing over, "Follow me!" Which I did!

"There it is," Charlie said. "There's a Forest Service strip down there." As I looked ahead, I watched him go into a right bank, head down and vanish into the hole, I started a slow 360-degree turn over it waiting to hear from him, which took about 10 seconds, when he blurted out, "Don't turn to the right! I'm in a canyon!" and all went quiet while I sat there helplessly waiting.

"I'm out of the canyon," came his voice minutes later, and then he added, "Come on down I'm lined up on the strip."

What relief washed over me! But...

"Come on down..." was something I'd never done before in clouds. I gingerly let the Citabria slowly spiral down the hole. In seconds I could see trees, the canyon, and then a lot of flat Big Sky landscape. As I turned left under the cloud base, there was the Forest Service strip right on my nose.

I backed off more on the throttle and the sweet tail-dragger settled down on solid, smooth earth. I sighed, and just let the Citabria roll out on her own until we ran out of inertia so I could quit shaking. And then, taxiing up to Charlie in the 206 waiting at the end of the strip, the Lycoming engine ran out of gas.

So, the other day I rolled into the gas station in Bend - the little red warning light still staring at me - and pulling up to the pump, the 4Runner's engine went silent.

With a big smile, I said to myself, "I wonder if Charlie's still borin' holes in the sky in his 206...."
