TREE: Removal will happen before spring softens ground sprouted about the time the Pilgrims landed at Plymouth. "We don't take this lightly," Galecki told The Nugget. "But it's becoming more and more obvious that this is becoming increasingly a huge threat." The tree is located close to Whychus Creek, perhaps 40 yards downstream from the footbridge. If it fell, it could reach paved paths in the park. The upper part of the tree is dead, and Galecki noted excessive dripping pitch, indicative of an old injury. "The large tree has a substantial and dangerous lean," the forester noted. The removal will happen pretty soon. "I suggested this winter or spring — before spring really kicks in," Galecki told The Nugget. He thinks the tree should come down before spring weather softens up the ground or winds kick up that could push the old tree over.
