they've grown up on."

Dirico described the training and experience as a win for all involved, noting the Forest Service is constrained by budgetary issues, his Marines need training opportunities, and the taxpayer "gets a bigger bang for the buck."

Kassidy Kern, public affairs specialist and civil rights chair for the Deschutes National Forest, told The Nugget that the Allingham Guard Station "was originally built in the 1950s as a cookhouse for the nearby guard station and larger compound. When the guard station burned down, the use of the cookhouse was then converted to a guard station and the building has undergone modifications over the decades, which made it ineligible for listing on the historic registry. It has served as a place for one of our hand crews to be stationed out of, and then was also used as a fire camp until we moved fire camps in town to the schools."

Kern said the doors of the guard station were preserved prior to demolition, because "the hardware on the doors is historically significant and difficult to find. So when we do restoration projects on other buildings of the era, we should be able to repurpose them."

Amy Racki, recreation team leader for the Forest Service, told The Nugget that she enjoyed working with the Marines.

"It's a great opportunity to have Marines working in concert with the Forest Service, to help in restoring public lands," she said.

Racki said that the Forest Service has not decided on a future use of the former guard station, noting that all ideas were under review but that no definite plans had been decided on.

Marine Sergeant Navalharo is a logistics vehicle driver from Eugene.

"In eight years in the Corps I've seen houses blown up, blown up doors, watched line charges shot out of tanks, but watching them bulldoze the guard station was the best thing I've seen. It just went down," he said, smiling.

In addition to the demolition projects, Marines were busy cleaning up areas around the Allingham Guard Station that were choked with old wire, steel tracking, and treated construction timber, and gathering it for removal.

The Marines will be working on both the Deschutes and Willamette National Forests until July 26.
