Early harvest, great grapes for Oregon

By Dylan Darling
The Register-Guard

CROW (AP) — An early spring and ideal summer growing weather led to an early wine grape harvest in the southern Willamette Valley.

"It definitely helped ripen the fruit the way we want it," Sweet Cheeks Winery & Vineyard winemaker Leo Gabica said.

Sweet Cheeks and other wineries nestled in the hills around Eugene had their grapes off the vine by the end of September — typically when the harvest starts.

This year's harvest is the earliest King Estate, southwest of Eugene, completed in its more than two-decade-long history. "You credit that to the quality and ripeness of the fruit," Chief Executive and co-founder Ed King said.

Area winemakers and winery owners said 2016 looks to be another great year for grapes, particularly in terms of quality. It follows two memorable harvests, which produced exceptional yields and left cellars well stocked with aging wine.

"It is just astonishing, the quality of the fruit," King said.

Winemakers still must tally the tonnage of this year's harvest, but many said it will not be as large as either of the past two record-setting years. Wineries in the southern Willamette Valley harvested 8,618 tons of wine grapes in 2015 and 7,038 tons in 2014, up from 4,731 tons in 2013, according to data from the Southern Oregon University Research Center in Ashland.

Optimal weather for much of the year and an early start to the growing season contributed to the early harvest and fruit quality, experts said. Winter was not too cold, spring was mild, and the summer had little extreme heat.
