The Weather Machine will play The Belfry Saturday night.

The Weather Machine to rock The Belfry

Indie folk rock band The Weather Machine is returning to the Belfry for their second annual Thanksgiving hometown throwdown show.

The group's last appearance was at the Sisters Folk Festival when they said farewell to cellist and Sisters High School grad Matthew Cartmill, who followed his heart to Seville, Spain, in September. This show marks the first appearance of the band's new lineup, fronted by Sisters local Slater Smith, with Luke Hoffman on drums, Andre Zapata on bass, Noah Bernstein on saxophone, and introducing Tim Karplus on electric guitar. This show will likely be The Weather Machine's last appearance before they disappear into the studio to work on their third full-length album. Prolific lyricist and songwriter Jeffery Martin opens the night.

The show is set for Saturday, November 26. Doors open at 7 p.m.

U of O enrollment drops for fourth year

EUGENE (AP) — Enrollment at the University of Oregon fell 2 percent this year, marking four years of declining enrollment for the school.

The Register-Guard reports that a total of 23,634 students enrolled at the university this year, down 2 percent from fall 2105 and 4 percent from the record high in fall 2012.

Overall, the student population at the university has been falling or flat for a half-dozen years after UO officials quickly increased the student population in a major growth spurt.

Though overall enrollment is falling, the number of out-of-state graduate students has been growing, with 11 percent more undergraduates coming from outside Oregon this year compared to 2002. The number of in-state graduate students has dropped 25 percent since peak enrollment in 2002.
