RIOTS: Unrest sparked by ‘Not Guilty’ verdict in King case

feeling. Mostly, people were thinking, “Here we go again.”

Thankfully, we didn’t.
The federal trial found that two of the officers had violated King’s civil rights.
Some people were more-or-less satisfied; some people still thought the officers got off too easy; some people thought the second trial smelled of double jeopardy and a railroad job.
Mostly, people were simply exhausted and relieved that the horrible multi-year ordeal was over. Rodney King went on with his ill-starred life until he was found OD’d and dead in his swimming pool at the age of 47 in 2012.

Marilyn and I decided there was no way in the world we were going to stay in the L.A. area to raise a family.
It wasn’t so much the riots themselves, which had only tangentially impacted us; it was what they represented to us: An apocalyptic urban dystopia that could only be coped with by fleeing it.

In October 1993, we headed north to Central Oregon. As we hit Ventura and turned north on the 101, I played Guy Clark’s L.A.
Freeway on the tape deck in my little white truck:

If I can just get off of this
L.A. Freeway

Without getting killed or caught

I’ll be down the road in a cloud of smoke

For some land that I ain’t bought...

So Ceili, who turns 18 on May 2, was born and raised in Central Oregon because her parents decided to step outside the blast radius of one of the worst race riots in American history. Twenty-five years on, much has changed for the better — yet we remain a deeply divided, often angry nation, awaiting the next explosion.
