and a large tray, to simulate various types of liquid or gas fires.

All training was completed using propane as the fuel to minimize environmental impact. Cloverdale and Sisters-Camp Sherman firefighters spent several hours working as teams of six to eight to learn to control these types of fires.

Deputy Chief Tim Craig of Sisters-Camp Sherman Fire District said that they need be prepared to fight these types of fires with the number of hazardous material cargo trucks, fuel stations, and propane tanks in our fire districts.

Fire Chief Thad Olsen of the Cloverdale Fire District said that interagency training is extremely important for our agencies as they work together on many of their calls.

“We have to be able to integrate our operations so that when personnel from each agency show up, they can work together seamlessly to resolve the problem at hand,” he said.

Firefighters from the Black Butte Ranch, Cloverdale, and Sisters-Camp Sherman districts regularly train and operate together to provide the best services possible to local communities.

coffee house whilst you plan your next ride in your fancy biking gear. I don't even mind the worst sign language from you as you impatiently pass me while en route to your fancy retreat in the woods.

I don't want you to have to deal with the worst, so may I suggest highway 58 or 26; we'll sure miss you making this awesome town the worst.

To the Editor:

I agree with Ms. Pepperling (The Nugget, Letters to the Editor, July 12) in her support of the roundabout. Any junction — be it with stop sign, stoplight, or roundabout — will back up if the traffic density becomes high enough.

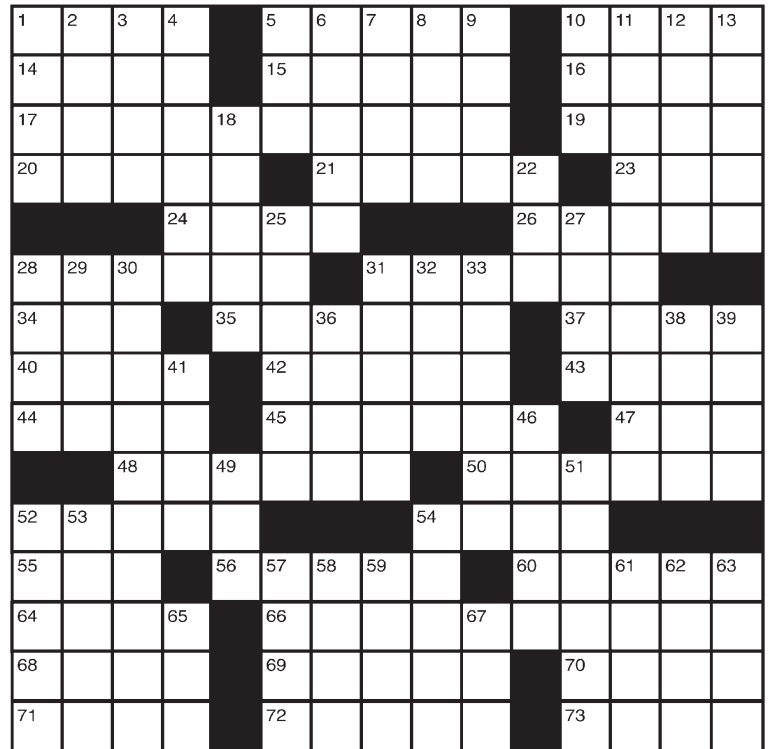

Stepping back and looking at the big picture, when traffic density returns to “normal,” the roundabout works like a charm. I frequently have to travel from north to south over Highway 20; the roundabout is a vast improvement over the old stop sign.
