

MURAL: Project teaches management skills as well as art

Creeks Brewing Co. and was designed by Sarah Rubbert. We took her composition and refined the colors and shapes before we began. I would describe it as colorful and it does a good job of illustrating the vibe of the company and the Central Oregon Lifestyle.”

Graves calls it a valuable real-world experience, going through the design process, buying supplies, and seeing how much time it takes to complete a large-scale project.

“The students are bussed over to the production facility on Barclay Drive during their art class.

One thing the class needed was a heavy-duty scaffold to stand on to paint, since the storage container is nearly nine feet tall.

Graves said, “A huge thank-you to Sisters Rental for donating the use of the scaffold so they can access the entire framework of the mural.”

Gunnarson arrives on site with her class and helps them map out parts of the mural, while professional muralist David Rock of Sisters is ready in case they need his expertise.

“I contacted Bethany a couple of years ago and asked if she ever needed my help to contact me. And she did,” Rock told The Nugget. “I’m just volunteering help wherever they need it, but I’m not doing much.”

Rock has been painting murals for over 35 years, with his first mural in 1983 at the Bronx Zoo. The largest single mural he has done is over 10,000 square feet.

“I think the biggest challenge for them has been taking a design and scaling it up from 10 inches to 52 feet! It’s always difficult to have the discipline to enlarge an image without wanting to draw something that is on a more understandable scale,” Rock added. “This is an educational opportunity to learn the tricks of scaling something up and keeping the proportions the same.”

Sisters High School art class is working to bring their mural to life, with the Three Sisters Mountains as the backdrop, the colors are evolving into images that will soon become Three Creeks Brewing Company’s work of art for public viewing.

The students involved with painting the mural are Jade Anaya, Alexa Asson, Victoria Franklin, Sierra Henneous, Delia Hoyt, Grace Maiden, Meredith Mandal, Shaely Meyer, Nolan Mitchell and Sarah Rubbert.
