HISTORY: Native peoples were present on land

dug up an old satchel full of obsidian tools. The bag disintegrated immediately after being unearthed by a backhoe leaving an array of tools cached there possibly hundreds of years before. They were left to be used by the next Northern Paiute hunters who camped next to what was later named Paulina Springs.

Management at Black Butte Ranch brought in an expert to assess the find and make sure there were no burial grounds in the area. After it was ascertained that it was not a burial site, the obsidian has been cared for by the Ranch, and there are plans to eventually display them for visitors to learn more about the original people who called the area home.

As a long-time visitor to the Ranch, hearing Wewa's words and deep understanding of the area as home to his people, I felt my appreciation and reverence for the area and the Northern Paiute people expand. Making a go of it in the Central Oregon weather and often-harsh landscape was never easy for early people. But the Native Americans figured out how to live in harmony with the land and its inhabitants by seeing all of God's creation as brothers and sisters.

Wewa pointed out that early human culture in the Great Basin was not without its exploitations and cruelty. There was a constant flow of people from different areas from the Klamath River to the Columbia who traded all manner of things from beads to slaves.

Hearing that that kind of commerce was taking place on what is now Black Butte Ranch was hard to hear and heart-wrenching. Just the little bit of history I unearthed in my efforts to tell a complete story of the area made me remember the human travesties we are still reckoning with today began thousands of years ago in places I never imagined. History is complicated and I've learned all we can do is try to tell the whole story, not just the one that glorifies one group of people and demonizes another.

It's an old plot and an old story that needs to be heard, and hopefully left behind, as a cautionary tale we will finally stop repeating.
