What's Happening in the Sky

October 13-19

As Halloween looms on the horizon, the realm of night quietly continues to expand. Thirteen hours of each day are devoted to a sky of distant stars, with sunset occurring at the relatively early time of 5:30 p.m. Accordingly, average nighttime lows drop to 42°, while the weakened sunlit highs reach only 64°. Yet, for all its coolness, this is a blessed season, when strikingly colored days are followed by enhanced opportunities to read the scroll of night.

One especially beautiful ornament on that scroll is the nearby moon. It can be seen in the cratered glory of its half-phase Friday, October 14th. Accompanying it to its far right will be the largest planet, Jupiter. This almost-star (which emits twice as much heat as it receives from the sun) appears bright white and far more conspicuous than any star in the sky. However, even Jupiter is dwarfed in apparent luminosity by Venus, which precedes the sunrise in the east by two hours, rising at 4:30 a.m. Very near to brilliant Venus on its left is the glowing red planet Mars (also easily visible with the unaided eye) while close on its right is one of the brightest stars of night, Regulus. Such are some of the consolations of an insistent early morning alarm clock!

This Week's Terrestrial Eye-Opener (taken from the book, This is a Flower, by Ross Hutchins): "As a general rule, wind-pollinated plants that grow far apart produce more pollen. For example, plants growing 100 inches apart produce about ten thousand times more pollen than those growing only an inch apart."

—Larry Deckman

Glow-in-the-dark star maps are currently available to be put on the ceiling above your bed for $7 each. To get a copy and light up your rainy nights with stars, call Larry Deckman at 343-7166.
