Riverfront Research

million to replace the University's steam plant and other existing buildings, may be a serious deterrent to full development.

One local researcher who hopes the University will move forward with plans to expand its research capabilities is Herb Severson, science coordinator at Oregon Research Institute, which conducts research in the behavioral sciences.

"There's a tendency to think of the park as a unique, new process," says Severson, 42, who points out that ORI has been working with University professors and students for 27 years.

"We don't take a position on the site . . . but as a group we benefit by having more research groups in Eugene," said Severson.

The critical mass required to attract other researchers may be lacking in other disciplines locally, but is already here in the social sciences and will only be augmented by a development like the park, says Severson.

"We can't help but think that bringing together different groups would have a synergistic effect," said Severson.

Severson is quick to add that the most of the money flowing into ORI from 23 federally funded projects goes to personnel, because research tends to be "labor intensive."

Current plans call for phasing the Riverfront Park into the 71 acres of state-owned land over the next 10 to 20 years. If the park is built to completion, it could contain a million square feet for light, research-oriented manufacturing, offices, laboratories, and service businesses.

The next major step in moving the park closer to reality is slated for this summer, when the master site plan is scheduled to be completed, then reviewed at a public hearing conducted by the city.

Maureen McAvey, director of development in Los Angeles for the Carley Capital Group, the project's real estate development firm, said in a May 3, 1987 interview with the Eugene Register-Guard that aggressive marketing for an anchor tenant could begin once the site plan is approved.

The project, a partnership between Carley, the City, the University, and the state Board of Higher Education, has been under fire from some citizens since public hearings began on the issue in May 1985.

"There is no question that we've heard opposition—we've also heard a lot of support," said McAvey. "People have taken a spectrum of positions from 'no development' to 'develop it as intensely as possible.'"
